But I have probably said enough to give some idea of the work these schools do. The question occurs to me: Do these "Normals" serve a real use, or are they another branch from the great American humbug-wood? It appears to me that they serve a use. They are not colleges, of course. One should not go to a Normal to obtain a systematic education; its life is too short. But for music-teachers in ordinary communities, who wish to spend their summer vacation profitably in enlarging their stock in trade, I know of no opportunity so available as one of these schools. The piano-recitals would be rare even in the musical season of a large city (except Boston). And the other advantages are nowhere else to be got. They are not a money-making institution. The teachers work harder than in their busy season at home, and receive less pay for it. The local musical academies which are becoming so common throughout the interior do not fill this place, for no such school can afford to employ the class of teachers we find in the "Normals." Nor do the Conservatories meet the need. For setting aside the fact that most of the so-called Conservatories are such only in name, they do not furnish this kind of practical instruction in the method of teaching which the less experienced teachers need so much—and besides, the only season of the year when teachers can afford to go to school is precisely the vacation of the conservatories. I conclude, therefore, that the Normal Music School is for the present a legitimate musical means of grace, in so far as it tends toward an artistic musical culture and a simple way of leading pupils to expressive and artistic playing. And that piano teachers have now begun to esteem some study of teaching desirable, I regard as one of the most hopeful signs of the times.

Necrology.

During the past summer not a few musicians of considerable note have passed away. No stars of the first magnitude have been withdrawn, nor were there such (forgive us, worshippers of Wagner!) Nor has the musical world been called upon this year to pay its obituary tribute to names of equal consequence with Meyerbeer and Berlioz, Moscheles, Hauptmann, Loewe. But the musical journals abroad chronicle the recent death of quite a number of musical artists and composers, who once gave promise of a fine career of original productivity, some of whom have written many works in larger forms, and most of whom have held positions of usefulness and honor until they were called away. It is sad to think, however, of the amount of glowing aspiration, of intense ambition, study, and of dogged or impassioned labor that has gone into the composition of so many operas, symphonies, and works of chamber music, of which all that will be remembered is their bare names and opus numbers dryly registered in musical encyclopedias. But so it is in all the spheres of human occupation; it is only the exceptional that is remembered; the very smallest part of what is written will be read a few years hence. And yet none the less in Art its own rich reward; none the less is it desirable to make life itself an Art, to carry the artistic spirit into all we do, and in our own humble or more favored way to practice arts according to the measure and the quality of talents given us. We do not believe that the composers of forgotten works, if they have worked with a pure zeal for truth and beauty, have all thrown their lives away. Art, culture generally, humanity, if not their own personal fame and fortune, will have gained something through their efforts; and it will be partly through their seeking, (through their failures, it may seem) that others will have reached ideals. Think of Bach's and Handel's musical contemporaries, what enormous quantities of music they composed; and not in any superficial, trivial, easy form or style; but altogether on the fugued or polyphonic system, works as elaborate and learned as those of the immortal two. Telemann, for instance, is said to have composed and written down with his own hand as many scores as Bach and Handel put together, and in the same great forms; yet not a page of it is found in the repertoire of to-day! And he was by no means the only example of the kind. Truly there were giants in those days, and they are nearly all forgotten! They spread their notes, their thoughts, their souls' ideals, over incalculable reams of paper, and yet their page in history is blank. What Time swallows up of the musical production of our days is a mere trifle to what was crowded into his insatiable maw by vastly fewer workers, only they were giants, in the first half of the eighteenth century.

Among the names recorded in the recent "Necrology" of foreign musical journals we note the following:—

1. Of MICHEL CARAFFA, who had long outlived his fame as an Opera composer, enjoying a certain amount of popularity, especially in Paris, in Rossini's day, we copy an account on our last page. Probably not one of his operas ever crossed the Atlantic; and the only scrap of his music ever known in these parts was the overture to his "Prison of Edinburg," of which some of our old concert-goers of Boston Academy and "Musical Fund" days may retain a not very distinct recollection.

2. HEINRICH ESSER, who died at Salzburg, after a long illness, on the 3d of June, at the age of 53, was hardly known among us here except through his arrangements for orchestra of some of the great organ works of Bach,—particularly the Toccata in F, which has been several times performed in the Harvard Symphony Concerts. He was born at Mannheim in 1818; was appointed kapellmeister at the Court opera theatre in Vienna in 1847, where he was also president of the Haydn Verein, until 1869, when ill health compelled him to retire from labor, and he removed to Salzburg, where he has been almost continually confined to his chamber. As a song composer Esser has made a good name for himself; and several operas by him have been brought out,—particularly "Die beiden Prinzen," and "Riquiqui," but without lasting success. He is said to have been a remarkably thorough musician, an excellent director and a man of broad and profound culture; he was an enthusiast for poetry as well as music; his reverence for Dante is well known. As a man he was loved by his colleagues and esteemed by all for his integrity, right-mindedness and zealous fidelity to duty.—Besides his songs and operas, he wrote a Psalm, a Symphony, and various chamber music. His funeral was largely attended by representatives of Austrian musical societies, and one of Bach's funeral choruses was sung at his grave.

3. HUGO ULRICH is a name which promised at one time to stand very high in the records of German musical art. "His earliest compositions," says the Neue Zeitschrift, "justified the greatest hopes, and up to the latest moment, at the age of mature manhood, much was expected from so rich a talent. Ulrich was born November 26, 1837, at Oppeln, and died on the 23d of May, 1872, in Berlin, at the Jewish hospital, where he, the Catholic, suffering from an incurable disease, had for some months found refuge. The son of a gymnasium teacher, after passing the usual examination upon leaving college, he went in 1856 to Berlin, to devote himself entirely to music, and there for nearly three years he enjoyed the tuition of Prof. Dehn. He attracted remarkable attention through his B minor Symphony, which the royal orchestra brought out in 1858. He became still more known through his Sinfonia triomphale, which won for him the prize of 1,500 francs in Brussels. Both of these works have kept their place upon the repertoire of the Berlin Symphony orchestra to this day; they have made their way throughout all Germany, and during this last winter the royal Kapelle (a rare distinction) performed the B-minor Symphony twice. Among his other works may be named a Trio in C major, a violoncello Sonata, a string Quartet and an Overture, besides small pianoforte compositions and songs. Through a wealthy friend he was enabled in 1855 to make an extended tour in Italy, mainly with a view to fathom the mysteries of the style of singing. When he returned to Berlin in 1858, his productive energy was evidently extinct. A grand opera was expected from him, for which Max Ring had made the text ("Bertram de Born"); but the opera did not appear. On the other hand an Overture, which was performed, made only a moderate sensation; from that moment Ulrich retired into deep silence, betraying his existence to the artistic world only through numerous pianoforte arrangements of classical works; these are reputed models in their way. The success attending the last performance of his B-minor Symphony seemed to rekindle his productive activity; he conceived the resolution to execute the plans of former years; but soon the illness seized him, from which he was not destined to recover."

Hugo Ulrich is probably only known in this country to those who have studied the Concertos of Moser, the Quintets, Quartets, Trios, &c., of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Schubert through his most useful four-hand arrangements, published in Lenzert's series of "Haus-Musik," Leipzig. More than twenty of Mozart's piano Concertos he has made accessible in that form.

4. WILHELM WIMPACHT, the famous director in chief of all the military bands of Prussia, a great favorite of Emperor Wilhelm from the days when he was Regent, died on the 4th of August at Berlin. His success will be remembered at the concours of military bands in Paris at the great exposition in 1867, on which occasion he was made a knight of the Legion of Honor. He was born at Anchenhausen August 10, 1802, the son of the town musician, of whom at an early age he learned the violin and nearly all the wind instruments. He afterwards had Concertmeister Haase in Dresden for his violin teacher, and then appeared in concerts at Leipzig both as violinist and trombonist. In 1824 he entered the royal Kapelle at Berlin as violinist, but soon began to turn his attention to the military music, for which he composed industriously. He also entered deeply into the study of acoustics, which led him to make various improvements in wind instruments, besides inventing new ones, such as the chromatic bass-tube, and an instrument of wood which he called the Batyphon. Since 1838 he has had all the band music of the regiments of the Guards under his direction, prescribing the number and quality of the instruments, arranging the music, &c., all upon a unitary system. It has been said that he knew more about all varieties of orchestral and band instruments than any man living, and that even Berlioz owed much to him. He has composed innumerable marches and dances, and some songs, and has made a great many arrangements of orchestral and other works for bands of Harmonie-musik. He was fond of mixing vast numbers of wind instruments together, and even arranged Symphonies of Beethoven for a monster band of seven or eight hundred instruments, which under his careful drill executed them with remarkable precision and light and shade. He has written various essays in the musical journals of Berlin, and when we made his acquaintance there in 1860, he showed us some of the manuscript of a very elaborate work on instruments and instrumentation; but of its publication we have never heard. He was a hearty, genial, entertaining man, and took a cordial interest in musical Americans who visited Berlin.

MADAME RUDERSDORFF, as many will be glad to learn, will make Boston her headquarters during the fall and winter, having taken rooms at the Bellevue Hotel, in Beacon Street. She has consented to give some lessons and advice in the art of singing, whenever she is in the city, to a limited number of pupils. During the present month, especially, her time will be free for that purpose. Surely not only amateurs, but not a few of our public singers, who are by no means perfect, should be prompt to avail themselves of the advice and assistance of so complete an artist, so full of the vitality and earnestness that cannot but inspire a pupil. If only to acquire something of the true dramatic quality, many a singer will do well to come within the influence of Madame Rudersdorff.

Carafa.

Last week we chronicled the death of a composer renowned in his day, but one whose name and fame had almost glided from the remembrance of men. Never perhaps since 1828 was Michel Henri Carafa so much in the mouths of his contemporaries as during last week, in Paris, the week of his death. That event brought back memories of one of the most prolific composers of his time—the musician who wrote "Semiramis" and "Masaniello" before Rossini and Auber had thought of those themes—the Academician of thirty-five years standing—the man who served under Murat. Carafa's history was emphatically a history of the first quarter of the century. He survived his popularity—survived even the mention of his works, and was only known during the last forty years through the friendship which Rossini in his lifetime bore him, and by the occasional mention of him in the musical section of the Institute.

Carafa—or, to give him the benefit of his full name, Michel Henri François Aloys Vincent Paul Carafa de Colobraro—was born on the 17th November, 1787 (some say 1785), in Naples. In his infancy he showed a decided predilection for music, and his parents placed him under Penaroli and other masters of eminence, the effect of whose teaching is manifested in the purity of Carafa's style. His early compositions are said to have been very successful and facile. The musical career of the young student was interrupted by war; he was drawn and enrolled in a Neapolitan regiment and, before he had come of age, fell into the hands of the French at the battle of Campo Tenese in Calabria. This was in 1806. As a prisoner he attracted the notice of Murat, who attached him to himself, and as Lieutenant of Hussars Carafa de Colobraro served the new king and gained his captaincy during the Sicilian expedition. He followed Murat to Russia in 1812, and there received the Cross of the Legion, and the rank of chef d'escadron. This closed his military career; 1814 restored him to civil life, and he resumed his musical studies. A slight drawing room opera called "Il Fantasma" attained sufficient success in that year to induce him to try the stage. The "Vascello d'Occidente" was his first public production, brought out with considerable success at the Teatro del Fondo in his native town. Three others followed in the same year, thus attesting the composer's fecundity. These were "La Gelosia corrotta," "Gabriella di Vergi," and "I due Figaro." From Naples he went to Milan, Venice, and Vienna, scattering his works with the prodigality of a sower. In 1821 he arrived in Paris, and made his debut there at the Feydeau with a three-act opera, "Jeanne d'Arc," which only obtained a moderate success. Next year "La Solitaire" had a much better fate, and from that time Carafa settled down in Paris and went industriously to work, writing for the Italian theatres of that capital and abroad, and for the Opéra Comique. Between 1823 and 1828 he produced "Le Valet de Chambre," "L'Auberge supposée," "Sungarido," "La Violette," "La Belle au bois dormant," "Il Sonnambulo," "Il Paria," in 1828, "Masaniello," "Jenny," in 1829, "Le Nozze di Lamermoor," in 1830, "Le Livre de l'Ermitte," "L'Auberge d'Amoy" (in collaboration with Hérold); in 1831, "L'Orphe" (ballet at the Opéra); in 1833, "La Prison d'Edimbourg," "Une Journée de la Fronde," in 1834, "La Grande duchesse," which closed the list. In 1834 his popularity went out. Two years subsequently an attempt was made to revive "La Solitaire," his initial success; but the Paris public had ceased to care for Carafa. In 1837 he took the place of Le Sueur in the Institute, and having officiated as director at the Gymnase Musical Militaire he became, on its suppression, Professor of Ideal Composition at the Conservatoire and Officer of the Legion in 1847. From this time to his death the world forgot Carafa.

The friendship of Rossini for the maestro en retraite was loyal and firm. Carafa's poverty touched Rossini, who sought how to alleviate it without wounding the composer. Thus when a French translation of "Semiramis" was first talked about, and Méry was suggested to do it, Rossini recommended M. Porrin to entrust Carafa with the manipulation of the recitatives and ballet music. This being accorded, off went Rossini to M. Fould, who was at that time Minister of the Fine Arts, and asked him to raise the author's fee on "Semiramis" from 300 to 500 francs, although it was only a translation. The Minister could refuse nothing to the composer of "Guillaume Tell." Rossini thanked him for the concession, adding that Carafa and Méry were not millionaires, and they would appreciate the increase.

"Carafa?" repeated M. Fould. "Why I thought you wrote the music of 'Semiramis,' M. Rossini?" "Of 'Semiramis' in 1823 at Naples, yes; but the Parisian 'Semiramis' of 1860 is to be my friend Carafa's, who will divide the fees with my other friend, Méry."

The warmth of Rossini's regard remained Carafa's chief consolation in his obscurity. Down to extreme old age Carafa retained his love of horsemanship acquired in the Hussars, and the frequenters of the Champs Elysées often remarked an old gentleman mounted on a nearly equally old horse joggling towards the Villa Rossini in the Bois de Boulogne. Sometimes the step of the animal faltered, whereupon the old gentleman would dismount and walk beside his faithful servant. This horse had its history as well as its master, and that history has been enshrined in the Musée des Familles (December, 1865), by M. Oscar Comettant. When Rossini died, Carafa gave up his out-door exercise and scarcely stirred from the house. He had for some time been subject to rheumatism which became more painful as he grew older, and during the siege of Paris paralysis supervened, and left him without the liberty of motion. At this period his wife fell ill of a malady which carried her off. The story of her devotion to her husband and the pious fraud by which she kept her own approaching death from him is all but incredible; yet we are assured it is true. Feeling that her illness was incurable, yet knowing the blow would hasten her husband's end, she kept all knowledge of her danger from him. In conspiracy with her doctors and relatives she got up the pretence of leaving Paris. Carafa was led to believe that his wife had avoided the blockade, and letters prepared before her death and dated from a friendly retreat in the provinces were delivered him from time to time, even after the devoted woman had expired. L'Evenement maintains, though we have grave difficulty in believing it, that Carafa remained ignorant that his wife had preceded him to the tomb. On the 27th of July, at five o'clock in the morning, the oldest of French composers and one of the most prolific writers of the century passed away also.

The Musical Opinions of Mazzini.

The Parisian Ménestrel contains the following interesting extract from his work entitled "La Philosophie de la Musique."

"German music," wrote the great Italian patriot, "differs in a marked degree from that of the Italian schools. It is God without man; it is a temple, a religion, an altar, but without a worshipper or a priest. Harmonious in the extreme, it represents the social idea, a general union, a thought, but without individuality to transpire the reflection into action, which alone can develop and symbolize it. The human being is banished from it—The soul lives there, but in a state of existence which has nothing terrestrial about it. Similar to a life passed in dreams, where the senses are slumbering gently, and the imagination is floating in eternity. German music lulls the material instincts of life to sleep, and elevates the soul to immense and unknown countries; it is like a vague and uncertain souvenir, like the visions of a childhood passed in the midst of maternal caresses, in which every earthly trouble and joy vanishes from sight. It is elegiac music, music of soft memories, of wishes, of melancholy hope, of sadness, which cannot proceed from human beings; it is the music of angels who have dropped from heaven and wandered here below. Its home is in the skies, and thither it aspires. Like the poetry of the North, when still uncontaminated by foreign elements and preserving its primitive character, German music raises itself far above the face of the earth, and disdainful creation, turns its eyes towards heaven alone. It seems only to touch the earth in order to rebound with double force. It is like a child born with a sweet smile, which finds no smile to respond thereto; a soul full of love, which finds nothing mortal worthy of that love; it dreams of another world, another universe, and in that universe there is an image, the image of the being which could return that love, that virgin smile; it loves without being aware of the fact. This image, this type of immortal beauty appears unceasingly in German music, but in the shape of an undefined shadow; the form is hardly indicated. It is a short, timid, and irregularly drawn melody; and whereas Italian melody defines, seeks, and imposes the effect, its German sister retires from sight, veiled and mysterious. It is hardly a remembrance, it must be recomposed by the imagination. One carries you by force to the uttermost limits of delight, the other shows the road you have to follow, and then deserts you. German music is music carefully prepared, profoundly mystic in its nature, but a religion without a creed, without any activity of faith; it does not make a martyr of you; it does not conquer you, it fetters you with light chains most scientifically linked; it washes over you with a flood of waves, which, however, keep you afloat, elevating the mind, awakening the soul, and bringing all the faculties of imagination into play. Which is entitled to the palm of victory, the German or the Italian school of music?"

"Ah!" ejaculates the Ménestrel, "if Mazzini had but been satisfied with criticizing music!"

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Come Ladies and Lads. ("Old English Songs.") 3. C to e. 30
Come ladies and lads, get leave of your dads.
And away to the May-pole hic.

Then ev'ry lad did take his hat off to his lass,
And ev'ry girl did curt'ey, curt'ey,
Curt'ey on the grass.

A rare old song, which is well worth reviving, and cannot be excelled by a new one of similar character. Merry and jovial, with a light trip to the melody, and is a right cheerful thing to sing.

Come hither gently rowing. Duet. C to g. Murray. 30

Row on, row on, forever
I'd have thee by my side

Words by Coleridge, and is a very graceful duet.

Once again. 3. D to e. Sullivan. 30

Love, once again,
Meet me once again.

Partly in D minor, and is pensive, but expressive.

From the Cross uplifted high. Hymn Anthem. Bayd. 35

3. F to g.

The well-known hymn beautifully and simply arranged as a short anthem for soprano and bass solos, Soprano and Tenor Duet and Chorus.

Ho, every One that thirsteth. Quartette. 4. F to g. Wilson. 40

Very beautiful. A sweet and flowing melody, with pretty organ accompaniment. The cry "Come ye, buy—without money," is finely given.

Hope beyond the clouds. 3. Bb to g. Barnett. 30

There's hope beyond the clouds,
The clouds at last.

A serious but impressive song. A song of consolation.

One Kiss and Good-night. Song and Chorus. Geary. 30

3. Bb to f.

My spirit is wandering to thee, love,
To visions all gloriously bright.

One cannot hear Mr. Geary sing his sweet ballads without believing that his songs will be welcome in any company. Try them. They are not trashy. Both the vocal and instrumental parts are uncommonly good.

Graduate's Farewell. Song and Chorus. 3. Ab to e. Streeter. 30

Fare thee well!
Dear school of our happy childhood.

Save a copy of this for next 'graduation' day, as it is just what is wanted for a farewell to school.

Instrumental.

Academic Waltz. (Academische Bürger). Strauss. 75

3. By Edward Strauss. Has the regular Strauss ring to it.

Night Song. Nocturne. (Nacht-gesang). 4. Vogt. 30

Ab.

A very good name for a Nocturne, certainly, and a very good, melodious, and well wrought piece also.

Allegretto alla Marcia. 5. Db. Luigi 40

Requires considerable facility in playing runs of octaves, as they abound, but when properly executed will be very brilliant.

Railroad Steam Gallop. 3. C. Gungl. 20

An imitative piece, with a part to represent the puffing of a locomotive.

Strauss Dance Music, (with elegant Portrait.)

Wiener Bon Bon, 75

Circassian March, 50

New-Annen Polka, 40

Pizzicato Polka, 40

Lovely Vienna Waltzes, 75

These, with the Manhattan, Blue Danube, 1801

Nights, Artist Life, Morgenblätter, Marriage Bells,

Festival and Flirtation Waltzes, constitute a splendid collection of pieces printed in uniform style.

They are worth purchasing "as mazarins."

Polka des Glaneuses. (Gleaner's Polka). 4. Eggard. 40

G.

One can buy this without the fear of owning a polka like a great many others. It is very peculiar and piquant in character, and full of staccato and accented passages.

Amarellis. (Air du Roi.) 3. E. Glys. 40

Has the distinction of having been composed by Louis XIII. of France, and has a quaint, old-fashioned sweetness. Considered worthy of performance in Theodore Thomas' concerts.

Abbreviations.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B, flat, &c.

A small roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Two Biographies of Musicians.

From ED. HANSLICK'S review in the "Wiener Neue Freie Presse."

II.

The first volume of the life of MOSCHELES, now before us, begins at his childhood, and brings the biography down to the year 1835. We learn from it that Moscheles, born in 1794, the son of a small Jewish merchant in Prague, gave already at a very early age proof of extraordinary musical talent, and was first instructed by Dionys Weber, then by Albrechtsberger, who then occupied the first rank among the harmonists of Europe. Still later he became the scholar of Salieri, to whom he preserved the warmest attachment during his whole life. In his twentieth year he went to Vienna, and here immediately entered upon a most brilliant, stirring life. His talents developed so rapidly that the young virtuoso was soon numbered among the favorites of the Vienna public. The palm could only be doubtful between Moscheles and Hummel. While Hummel was unapproached in the legato, which "appeared to be velvet under his fingers, over which his running passages rolled like strings of pearl," Moscheles carried away the hearts of his audiences by his dashing bravura and youthful enthusiasm. The numerous brilliant invitations he received did not prevent him from working however. He tried to make up for lost time by composing until two and three o'clock in the morning. And yet he is ever dissatisfied with his achievements. "To-day I received much praise," he writes once, "particularly from Count P, who grew quite enthusiastic,—but I was not satisfied with myself." And again: "The company was delighted, but not so I, I shall have to improve very much yet;" and another time: "I did not permit myself to be prevailed upon to play, for I should not have done well to-day, and I always regret it afterwards when I play without enthusiasm." He heard Beethoven play once, the piano part of his Trio in B-flat major, but writes of him: "His manner of performing, setting aside the spirit, does not wholly satisfy me, because it lacks purity and precision,"—while he is quite enthusiastic over Meyerbeer, with whom he became quite intimate, and who exercised great influence over his own artistic development. "His bravura is indescribable. His manner of performing is unapproachable. I admire his quite peculiar manner of handling the instrument." But yet among the most valuable of Moscheles's acquisitions during his sojourn in Vienna, was his personal intercourse with Beethoven, for whom he made the piano arrangement of "Fidelio." "I have received the commission," he writes, "to make a transcription for the piano, of the masterwork Fidelio. What could be more desirable?"

Now follow short notices of how he took the different parts to Beethoven, who looked through them, and here and there the words: "he altered little," or, "he changed nothing;" or again, "he simplified," or "he strengthened." At one time he relates: "When I came early to Beethoven, he was in bed yet; he was particularly gay to-day, sprang out immediately, and went, just as he was, to the window on the 'Schotten-bastei,' to look through the pieces. Of course the boys in the street assembled under the window, till he exclaimed: 'These d—d boys! what may they want?' I pointed at him, smiling. 'Yes, yes, you are right,' he cried now, and slipped hastily into a dressing gown. Under the last piece I had written 'fine, with the help of God!'" He was not at home when I took it to his house, and when he returned it to me, I found under the words: "O mortal, help thyself!"

Of course Moscheles regularly visited the classical quartet performances established by Schuppanzigh, and always gives them the highest praise. Once he says: "I sat beside Spohr; we exchanged opinions upon what we had just heard; Spohr spoke with much warmth against Beethoven and his imitators." One day the Countess Hardegg sent for Moscheles to request his coöperation in a concert to be given for charitable purposes. He did not feel inclined to comply at first, having nothing new to play. She urged him to compose something for the occasion, and at length it was agreed upon that he should write variations upon the March played by the regiment (at the time of the Vienna Congress) assigned to the Emperor Alexander of Russia. This was the origin of the celebrated "Alexander March Variations," of which it was said for a long time that only Moscheles himself could play them, and which proved his crowning effort, wherever, in all his journeys, he performed them.

In 1821 he visited Holland, France and England, with extraordinary success. In London he had so enthusiastic a reception that he settled there in the following year. The decided favorite of the public, he soon became the teacher of the aristocracy, the most famous pianist in London; he was appointed professor at the Royal Academy of Music, Director of the Philharmonic Concerts, etc. He did a great deal, while in London, for the propagation of classical music, particularly Beethoven's; it was under his leadership that the "Missa Solemnis" was first performed there. Yet it may not be surprising to some that Moscheles mentions as the "bright side" of his sojourn in London, "good pay and a successful career." "I must make and listen to too much shallow music," he complains.

In the year 1823 he first returned to Germany. In Berlin he visits in the Mendelssohn family, and never grows weary of praising it in his journal. Felix Mendelssohn, to whom he was united by ties of the warmest friendship, is often mentioned, and the unenvying, enthusiastic appreciation with which he speaks of the compositions and performances of his younger friend, must prepossess everybody in favor of Moscheles's pure, amiable character. "That is a family," he writes, "as I have never known any yet; the fifteen-year old Felix a phenomenon, as there is not another to be found! What are all 'wonder-children' beside him? They are just 'wonder-children' and nothing more; this Felix Mendelssohn is already a matured artist, and only fifteen years old!" The parents repeatedly request Moscheles to give Felix a few lessons, but he always in a very modest manner declines. In his Journal he puts down: "He does not need lessons any more! If he chooses to catch some hints from me upon anything that may be new to him, he can easily do so." He grows more and more intimate with the Mendelssohn family; the friendship with Felix became in later years of permanent artistic importance, since it was Mendelssohn who, after the foundation of the Leipzig Conservatory, induced Moscheles to remove to Leipzig, and accept the first professorship of the piano there. After Mendelssohn's death, it was chiefly Moscheles's illustrious name that drew scholars to the Conservatory from all parts of the world.

On the occasion of a Concert he gave in Hamburg in 1825, Moscheles became acquainted with a young, accomplished lady, Charlotte Embden, the daughter of a banker of that city. A few days after their first acquaintance they were engaged, and four weeks later married. Moscheles owed to her the purest domestic happiness, during a model union of fully 45 years. To their first boy, Felix, Mendelssohn stood godfather.

In the early spring of 1826 Carl Maria von Weber had come to London to have his "Oberon" performed there for the first time, and visited at the house of Moscheles, being invited to dine there. "What a pleasure!" writes M. "But even here we were most deeply moved to compassion; for he entered our drawing-room speechless,—the one flight of stairs that led up to it had entirely taken away his breath; he sank into a chair near the door, but soon recovered, and then showed himself the most amiable and vivacious companion." The exertions and excitements of this musical season in London gave the last blow to Weber's already rapidly failing health. On the 4th of June M. noted in his Journal: "When I saw Weber to-day, Sunday, he spoke confidently of his departure for Germany; but the fearful, convulsive cough, that returned at short intervals, and left a state of total exhaustion, increased our fear to the utmost, and when he painfully told us he should leave in two days, and I should give him letters to take, if I pleased, he hoped to see me again on the morrow, my heart grew sore, although I did not suspect that I saw him then for the last time among the living." On the following morning Weber was found dead in his bed. M. most deeply moved by his loss, was indefatigably active in settling Weber's affairs. To Beethoven, too, in the immortal master's last illness, he proved a loving, active friend.

The further course of M's biography offers much yet that is interesting and attractive. Particularly would we point out his intercourse with Walter Scott, Henrietta Sonntag and Paganini. Very charming is the description of an evening, where Henrietta Sonntag, Walter Scott and Clementi met at the house of M., and the two old gentlemen, quite delighted, courted the charming singer. Walter Scott described to her every fold of the Scotch costume, as she must wear it in the "Donna del Lago," and Clementi suddenly arose with the words: "This evening I should like to play too!" This was received with general delight. "He extemporized with youthful freshness" writes M., "and already the circumstance that it was his habit ordinarily never to play, lent his performance a great charm. Then you should have seen how delighted the two old gentlemen were with each other, shook hands together, were not at all jealous of each other, in spite of the mutual admiration of Sonntag, but how the great man paid tribute to the great man."

Heinrich Heine, too, while in London, often visited at Moscheles's house, generally coming uninvited to dinner. Mme. Moscheles procured for him tickets of admission to all private galleries, parks, and public gardens, but asked him as a favor in return, that Heine should not mention Moscheles in his book about England. Upon his astonishment at this she said: "Moscheles's speciality is music; that interests you perhaps, but you possess after all no particular understanding for it, and so cannot write well on the subject. But you might easily discover something that would give play to your satire, and I should not like that." Heine laughing gave her his hand, and promised.—M. Scheles's biography grows more and more interesting as it advances. We look forward to the second volume with much pleasure, and shall not fail in time to report upon it to our readers.

Competitive Trials between the Vocal Associations of Male Voices in Belgium, and the "Concours International," at Verviers, on the 7th July, 1872.*

BY DR. FERDINAND HILLER.

Notwithstanding the cosmopolitan accomplishments by virtue of which this grand Germany of ours surveys every day the globe, and buries itself in the state of civilization before the "creation of the world," besides reading and translating the novels of all nations, it possesses, as a rule, very little precise information of what is going forward on the other side of the nearest frontier station. It is too much taken up with itself and its own peculiar interests. Not to go beyond my "last"—how little are our musical circles acquainted with the musical doings of our English, French, Belgian, and Italian neighbors. They know something about certain large theatres, concert-societies, &c., but, precisely at the point where the more intimate connection between art and national life, properly speaking, commences, their ignorance of what is done begins.

Male choral singing has, for a considerable time, played a great part in Germany. Its influence has been more superficial than profound; more of a social bond than an artistic stimulus. Many a magnificent song has been admirably sung, but as a rule there have been more bad songs than good ones, and they have been sung badly rather than well. At grand Vocal Festivals, beer and patriotism have been equally prominent—fortunately without any injury to our national prosperity. If the charge which we often bring against ourselves is well-founded, namely: that we are deficient in self-consciousness, we may give the Vocal Societies, Vocal Clubs, and Vocal Unions, the Polyhymnia, Cecilia, and Concordia Associations credit for forming excellent schools to cure the defect. As members of such an association, the simplest and most modest individuals are certainly not less proud than is an English peer of his hereditary right to take part in the government of the United Kingdom. They have even had their historiographers, whose duty it has been to see that not one serenade, trip, or greeting connected with them should be lost to posterity. As a rule, however, and despite numerous very, very honorable exceptions, one was obliged to say: "Much cry and little—music."

But I am allowing myself to indulge in evil backbiting of my dear fellow-countrymen and colleagues, a plan that may lead to no music, but to a great deal of uproar, and—not the slightest amount of wool. Yet my purpose was to speak about the "Kampfwagen der Gesänge," "The jousts and tournaments of song" among our neighbours!

I was invited thereto by a "grand international competition," got up at Verviers, on the 7th July, by the Royal Society called L'Emulation. I attended as one of the judges. I had previously often been thus distinguished, as, for instance, at Antwerp, Liège, Namur, etc., probably because the Belgians have not to go far to find me. But I was, also, charged with the task of writing an "obligatory chorus," a chœur imposé, and thanks, thereto, enjoyed the unusual treat of hearing a new work (the Psalm: "Super Flumina Babylonis") without having to go through any horrible rehearsals.

These vocal contests play a great part in Belgium. It would be difficult to find a national festival of which they do not constitute a feature, while the number of those got up without any extraneous object may be termed considerable. They are divided into various categories, with the International competitions at their head. The arrangements have been so developed in course of time that, in all their principal points, they may be regarded as permanent.

A corporation, or a Vocal Association, under its auspices, undertakes to get up a competition, or match. This may be open simply to one province, or a number of parishes and towns; it may stretch over the entire kingdom; or, lastly, all the nations on the face of the globe may be invited to take part in it. In the last case, as far as I know at least, only Kluemelauders, Dutch, and French from the frontier provinces, have hitherto appeared. They have carried off several high prizes. It was here that our own [Cologne] celebrated Choral Association for Male Voices won its first victories. These encouraged it to undertake its well-known, and so highly successful, journey to Great Britain.

* From the Kölnische Zeitung. Translation from the London Musical World.

The prizes consisting, partly of "Indemnités," as they are called, partly of gold medals, partly of valuable works of art, etc., are contributed from various quarters. In nearly all cases, we find a present from the King, and there is frequently a contribution from the Ministry; for Belgium, in proportion to its size, spends more on art than any other state. The town in which the festival is kept, the local societies, and some few private persons do their best. Thus I find that, on the occasion of the last vocal match at Verviers, at least 14 valuable medals (worth as much as 500 francs), are mentioned as being given by seven or nine associations, some of which (I may mention the Club Gymnastique, and the Société du Manège), are but very distantly connected with music—a proof of the deep interest taken in the subject. Special mention must be made of the present given by the Cercle des Artisans, and of a gold crown added to the first prize by the ladies of the town. Several months before the day of the match the announcements and invitations are made public, the different associations having to signify eight or ten weeks beforehand their intention of taking part in the proceedings. I must here touch upon a point which is interesting to all, but more especially to musicians. First-class competing societies are bound to sing the same compositions, and it is sent them four or five weeks before the meeting. The compositions intended for this purpose must be new. The compositions intended for this purpose must be new. The composers selected to supply them willingly undertake the task as a question of honor, which, however, is not unattended with material profit. The associations, compelled to master the same thing in the same time, thus contend on equal terms.

To form the board of arbitrators, invitations are issued to a smaller or larger number, as the case may be, of musicians of repute, who are always treated with the most gracious and splendid hospitality. They are formed into various sections, because at the larger meetings the competitors are singing-matching it in several places at once. Under these circumstances you frequently meet old friends again, and pass some exceedingly charming hours of good natured gaiety with your colleagues, though the office of arbitrator itself has its serious aspects and its moments of exhaustion. At Verviers there were more than twenty Minoers assembled, including one Dutchman (our old friend Verhulst), and several of our Rhenish colleagues.

A summary of the arrangements at this festival will be the speediest means of conveying a notion how the majority of such meetings are organized. 1. The third division for Belgians: associations from parishes containing less than 7,000 inhabitants. 2. The second division for Belgians: associations from towns of from 7,000 to 18,000 inhabitants. 3. The first division for the same: associations from towns of at least 18,000 inhabitants. 4. For foreigners: a second division for parishes and towns of less than 12,000 inhabitants. 6. International contest for Belgian and foreign associations, already the possessors of a first prize. 7. An International contest of Honor (an innovation introduced, I believe, by the Verviers Committee), for associations which have already carried off a first class prize (prix d'excellence). The divisions named under 1, 2, 4, and 5, have to sing two pieces, both of their own selection. The divisions, on the contrary, included under 4, 6, and 7, have to sing one obligatory chorus, and one chosen by themselves, a new piece being composed for each of the divisions under each of these heads. In addition to some smaller localities, the Theatre, and the riding school, a magnificent building, with accommodation for some thousand persons, were fitted up for the occasion.

The conditions, under which these friendly contests take place, display the most conscientious desire to mete out even justice to all. The reproduction of them at length would occupy too much space. I may mention, however, that the vocal solos, which possess so great a charm for the public, do not at all affect the awards, and that the Jury, without any deliberation, vote secretly. The order to be observed by the associations singing in the same division is decided by lot.

I had no opportunity of hearing in Belgium those associations from whose performances no very great things were to be expected. In all probability they suffer, as we so frequently find the case among ourselves, from the unsuccessful imitation of the larger associations, which they are but too eager to out-do even in their "very hawking and spitting." The performances, however, of such societies as are located in large towns, or, from peculiar circumstances, have more than a usually large number of members, and possess proper conductors, excel, as regards the virtuosity with which they execute the most difficult tasks, everything in this branch of art which it has fallen to my lot to hear in Germany. It is true that the tasks to be accomplished in the two countries are of an utterly different nature.

In our own country, male choral singing sprang from the love of convivial pleasures. To the joys which men transmitted, through their throats, inwardly to their bodies, were added those which, making their way through the throat outwardly, satisfied the needs of their souls. "Out of the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh." The notion of singing in common our veneration of women and wine, our love for nature and our native land, so magnificently expressed in our unique lyric poetry, could not fail to exert an irresistible influence on a people for whom, in the majority of cases at least, music constitutes a piece of their lives. The song in strophes, which, generally speaking, constitutes the primitive basis of all vocal music, offered itself both naturally and artistically, as the appropriate form. Through what phases it has passed during the present century; how it has wandered from the Liedertafel to the concert-room; how it was fated to have the honor of contributing to the manifestation of our national consciousness, as it grew more and more powerful; how male choral singing has, in many instances, been degraded to the level of mere ballad singing; and how, on the other hand, brought into connection with instrumental resources, by talented composers and active associations, it has been employed for higher artistic ends, might furnish materials for a not uninteresting octavo volume. That we can affect nothing with good-natured sentiment alone, we have frequently seen; and, unfortunately, the most glaring proof of this is supplied far too often by German male choral singing.

The contrasts of nationality, which, thank Heaven, are not abolished either by railways or steamboats, are most strikingly apparent when we come to consider male choral singing in Belgium as compared with male choral singing in Germany. Sprung, in the nature of things, from the French school of art, the dramatic, elocutionary, and, at times, even the outwardly pictorial, elements play the principal part in the former. Poems and compositions satisfying this tendency require, if they are to produce any sort of effect, a broader style of handling, and, from this fact alone, make greater demands upon the executants. But the Belgian and French composers who have cultivated this field of art have not been backward in presenting difficulties of another description as well. They do not shrink from the most daring runs, from the most surprising modulations—they write the chorals, five, six, or eight part, and they require the most delicate treatment of the falsetto, rapid, and yet strongly marked enunciation of the words, and peculiar coloring in cases of sharp outline. In their endeavors to offer us something new and characteristic, they have allowed themselves to be led away into attempting to imitate instrumental effects, and so on, a course by no means worthy of imitation. But compositions such as Les Emigrés Irlandais, Saul, and others by that admirable musician, Gervais; Les Corsaires Gras, by Soubre; the effective Hymn à la Patrie, written by Léon Jouvot, for Verviers, and many other compositions, require no such artifices. They need nothing but genuine choral art. When, moreover, we recollect that the most important performances take place at those Olympic Games, the prize singing-matches, we may easily form a notion of the energetic exertion to which singers and conductors may be impelled. It is impossible to dispose of the extraordinary performances springing hence by merely enquiring what was the number of rehearsals. The accomplishment of every artistic task requires time and industry. At the most, one would be entitled to step forward in opposition if what was got off by heart asserted itself at the expense of vitality. But this is by no means the case. To perfect technical skill, fine gradations of light and shade, and distinct enunciation, is added an amount of fire which borders on inspiration, and which simply carries the hearer away, no matter whether the ambition of gaining a prize plays as great a part in the matter as the desire to do artistic justice to the subject.

Belgian artists complain, it is true, that the expenditure of strength leading to victory is followed by a long reaction of inactivity; nay, that associations which have carried off all kinds of crowns, prefer resting upon their laurels to risking a defeat. But, then, fresh associations are continually being established, and stepping with all the fire of youth into the arena. As the principal object in view is competitive singing, we may truly say that what is lost in detail is gained in gras.

But there is one step in advance which might be taken: apart from their competitive singing, some of the best associations might be induced to unite in the performance of some grand composition with orchestral accompaniment. As, in this case, it does not matter what time is spent in preparation, such compositions might be got up long beforehand, quietly and surely. The expense occasioned by the co-operation of an orchestra, and, perhaps, of a few soloists, would not be of any consideration in so rich and large-hearted a country as Belgium, and the warm suffrages of the public might be reckoned on with certainty. The interest with which the public follow the singing-matches, is something indescribable. The better performances, and, still more, the best, are overwhelmed with applause, and the moment when the name of the conquering association is published is nothing short of a dramatic scene. The voting-papers are handed one after the other by the chairman of the jury to the secretary, who reads aloud their purport. There is a general and breathless silence, during which you feel that the public are silently counting the votes given to each of the competing associations. One of them has obtained a majority! Suddenly there bursts from the victorious singers a shout of joy which would have done honor to the Tentons of Tacitus, and it is only with difficulty that one can arrive at the announcement of the number of votes held back. If the arbitrators' verdict agrees with the feeling of the public, there is universal delight. But the contrary may, also, be the case; and then—why, then one sometimes gets a rather unpleasant specimen of the inconveniences and disagreeables of a highly democratic community. Fortunately this case is of extremely rare occurrence. —The combination suggested above for the performance of more important vocal works, for male choruses, would also be the best preparatory step for something which is floating before the minds of the leading Belgian composers, who always took so much interest in our Rhinish Musical Festivals—the general co-operation of the female world of music in grand oratorio-dramatic works. In Germany, male choral singing has exercised in this respect a decidedly injurious effect, as the compositions to which it has principally devoted itself are, in the common sense of the word, more entertaining, but, both intellectually and technically, of less account than that demanded from the exponents by works for mixed chorus. For the fact that, despite this, so much is effected, the reason must be sought in the indomitable and thoroughly musical nature of the Germans. In Belgium, the male choral singing which flourishes there would not act prejudicially on mixed choral singing—it would have to accomplish other tasks, but they would be by no means difficult.

One of the most gratifying phenomena at the singing-matches of our neighbors is the part, not simply active, but talented, taken in them by the laboring classes. The Orphéon from Brussels (under the direction of M. Bauwens), carried off in the International Match at Verviers the second prix d'excellence. It numbers eighty members, and consists entirely of working men. The first prize in the above category was won by the Society of Amis Réunis of Jupille. M. Th. Piedbois, a member of the Chamber of Deputies, and a rich manufacturer, has, from among his workmen, and other persons variously employed, formed, in the best acceptance of the word, a chorus of 90 persons. At the Verviers meeting he conducted it personally, with immense fire and unmistakably great ability. The next day, on a tribune erected in the market-place, he received, amid our congratulations, a golden medal, coming from his Majesty, the King, and an indemnification of 1,000 francs, which in their immeasurable joy his chorus certainly did not require. All honor to such efforts, which far surpass what is regarded as acts of humanity, because the latter without the former would be impossible!

The first prize of honor was gained by the Liège society—La Légia, under the direction of that talented musician, T. Radoux (brother of the Th. Radoux, who has rendered himself popular by the composition of a large number of pleasing songs). This Association, 137 strong, had scarcely to contend at all, for, in consequence of what was already known of its performances, all ideas of competing with it were abandoned by the other Belgian societies. It possesses the best qualities in abundance—the most admirable stuff, strength and power, together with that virtuos-like finish, attainable only by the most conscientious study, under a clever director, who is not merely a thorough musician, but specially accomplished vocally. I am glad, however, that I can here refer to the Cologne Liederkrans, under the direction of Herr Lorscheidt, which had the boldness to enter the lists against La Légia, and came out with all honor from the dangerous undertaking. With acclamation, and unanimously, the jury awarded it the gold medal placed at their free disposal for any extraordinary case. The members of the Society L'Emulation, who got up the festival, which, thanks to their sensible and kindly care, had gone off so well, did not think that, in a musical sense, they ought to be merely dumb lookers on: shut out by their own will from the competitive singing, properly so called, they had—in order, so to speak, to do the honors musically as well as otherwise—undertaken the difficult task of executing the two new pieces composed for the highest categories. They did so with such eminent merit that they nearly missed their friendly object by rendering it more difficult for the Associations which came after them to gain the due amount of appreciation. In praise of the conductor, Professor Th. Vercken, of Liège, I have merely to add that, until very lately, and for a great number of years, he was at the head of La Légia.

The town of Verviers was decked out during the Festival in the gayest colors; all the places in which singing was going on were crammed. In the Salle de l'Harmonie, the members of the board of arbitrators were invited to a really endless banquet, with the distinguished burgomaster, M. Ortmans-Hauzem, in the chair. I saw endless banquet, because some of us did not stop for its end, but went and chatted for a few hours of the next day in the charming garden, which was splendidly illuminated. The distribution of the prizes took place on the morning in the grand square. Thousands of spectators filled all the windows, roofs, and adjoining streets. But the weather was sultry and oppressive during the entire proceedings—a fact arising from no moral grounds. The envious gods were sulking, because the amusement of mere mortals lasted too long, though they were civil enough to defer manifesting their displeasure till we had reached the protecting roof. Then the rain poured down in never ceasing streams, washing away and overflowing everything, except the pleasant impressions which the Festival made on all taking part in it, and which at the present moment float around us as charming memories.

Facts about Fiddles.

Charles Reade, the novelist, writes to the Pall Mall Gazette, as follows:

Under the head of Cremona Fiddles, for want of a better, let me sing the four-stringed instruments that were made in Italy from about 1560 to 1760, and varnished with high-colored yet transparent varnishes, the secret of which, known to numberless families in 1745, had vanished off the earth by 1760, and has now for fifty years baffled the laborious researches of violin makers, amateurs and chemists.

The modern orchestra uses four-stringed instruments, played with a bow; the smallest is the king; its construction is a marvel of art; and, as we are too apt to underrate familiar miracles, let me analyze this wooden paragon, by way of showing what great architects in wood those Italians were who invented this instrument and its fellows at Brescia and Bologna. The violin itself, apart from its mere accessories, consists of a scroll or head, weighing an ounce or two, a slim neck, a thin back, that ought to be made of Swiss sycamore, a thin belly of Swiss deal, and sides of Swiss sycamore no thicker than a sixpence. This little wooden shell delivers an amount of sound that is simply monstrous; but, to do that, it must submit to a strain of which the public has no conception. Let us suppose two claimants to take opposite ends of a violin-string, and to pull against each other with all their weight: the tension of the string so produced would not equal the tension which is created by the screw in raising that string to concert pitch. Consider, then, that not one but four strings tug night and day, like a team of demons, at the wafer-like sides of this wooden shell. Why does it not collapse? Well, it would collapse with a crash, long before the strings reached concert pitch, if the violin was not a wonder inside as well as out. The problem was to withstand that severe pressure without crippling the vast vibration by solidity. The inventors approached the difficulty thus: they inserted six blocks of lime or some light wood; one of these blocks at the lower end of the violin, one at the upper, and one at each corner—the corner blocks very small and triangular; the top and bottom blocks much larger, and shaped like a capital D, the straight line of the block lying close to the sides, and the curved line outwards. Then they slightly connected all the blocks by two sets of linings; these linings are not above a quarter of an inch deep, I suppose, and no thicker than an old penny piece, but they connect those six blocks and help to distribute the resistance.

Even so the shell would succumb in time; but now the inventor killed two birds with one stone; he cunningly diverted a portion of the pressure by the means that were necessary to the sound. He placed the bridge on the belly of the violin, and that raised the strings out of the direct line of tension, and relieved the lateral pressure at the expense of the belly. But as the belly is a weak arch, it must now be strengthened in its turn. Accordingly a bass-bar was glued horizontally to the belly, under one foot of the bridge. This bass-bar is a very small piece of deal, about the length and half the size of an old-fashioned lead pencil, but, the ends being tapered off, it is glued on to the belly, with a spring in it, and supports the belly magically. As a proof how nicely all these things were balanced, the bass-bar of Gasparo da Salo, the Amati, and Stradivarius being a little shorter and shallower than a modern bass-bar, did admirably for their day, yet will not do now. Our raised concert pitch has clapped on more tension, and straightway you must remove the bass-bar even of Stradivarius, and substitute one a little longer and deeper, or your Cremona sounds like a strung frying-pan.

Remove now from the violin, which for two centuries has endured this strain, the finger-board, tail-piece, tail-pin and screws—since these are the instruments or vehicles of tension, not materials of resistance—and weigh the violin itself. It weighs, I suppose, about twenty ounces; and it has fought hundred weights of pressure for centuries. A marvel of construction, it is also a marvel of sound. It is audible farther off than the gigantic piano forte, and its tones in a master's hand go to the heart of man. It can be prostituted to the performance of difficulties, and often is; but that is not its fault. Genius can make your very heart dance with it, or your eyes to fill; and Niel Gow was no romancer, but only a deeper critic than his fellows, when, being asked what was the true test of a player, he replied: "A man is a player when he can get himself greet wi his feedle."

THE ROMANCE OF FIDDLE DEALING.

Nearly fifty years ago a gaunt Italian, called Luigi Tarisio, arrived in Paris one day with a lot of old Italian instruments, by makers whose names were hardly known. The principal dealers, whose minds were narrowed, as is often the case, to three or four makers, would not deal with him. M. Georges Chano, younger and more intelligent, purchased largely, and encouraged him to return. He came back next year with a better lot; and yearly increasing his funds, he flew at the highest game; and in the course of thirty years imported nearly all the finest specimens of Stradivarius and Guarnerius France possessed. He was the greatest connoisseur that ever lived or ever can live, because he had the true mind of a connoisseur and vast opportunities. He ransacked Italy before the tickets in the violins of Francesco Stradivarius, Alexander Gagliano, Lorenzo Guadagnini, Giodfredus Cappa, Gobetti, Morgillato Morella, Antonio Mariani, Santo Magini, and Matteo Benti of Brescia, Michel Angelo Bergonsi, Montaguana, Thomas Balestrieri, Storioni, Vicenzo Rugger, the Testori, Petrus Guarnerius, of Venice, and full fifty more, had been tampered with, that every brilliant masterpiece might be assigned to some popular name. To his immortal credit, he fought against this mania, and his motto was "A tout seigneur tout honneur." The man's whole soul was in fiddles. He was a great dealer, but a greater amateur. He had gems by him no money would buy from him. No. 91 was one of them. But for his death you would never have cast eyes on it. He has often talked to me of it; but he would never let me see it, for fear I should tempt him.

Well, one day George Chano, Senior, who is perhaps the best judge of violins left (now Tarisio is gone), made an excursion to Spain, to see if he could find anything there. He found mighty little. But, coming to the shop of a fiddle-maker, one Ortega, he saw the belly of an old bass hung up with other things. Chano rubbed his eyes, and asked himself, was he dreaming?—the belly of a Stradivarius bass roasting in a shop-window! He went in, and very soon bought it for about forty francs. He then ascertained that the bass belonged to a lady of rank. The belly was full of cracks; so, not to make two bites of a cherry, Ortega had made a nice new one. Chano carried this precious fragment home and hung it up in his shop, but not in the window; for he is too good a judge not to know the sun will take all the color out of that maker's varnish. Tarisio came in from Italy, and his eye lighted instantly on the Stradivarius belly. He peered Chano till the latter sold it to him for a thousand francs and told him where the rest was. Tarisio no sooner knew this than he flew to Madrid. He learned from Ortega where the lady lived, and called on her to see it. "Sir," says the lady, "it is at your disposition." That does not mean much in Spain. When he offered to buy it, she coquetted with him, said it had been long in her family; money could not replace a thing of that kind, and, in short, she put on the screw, as she thought, and sold it to him for about four thousand francs. What he did with the Ortega belly is not known—perhaps sold it to some person in the tooth-pick trade. He sailed exultant for Paris with the Spanish bass in a case. He never let it out of his sight. The pair were caught by a storm in the Bay of Biscay. The ship rolled; Tarisio clasped his bass tight, and trembled. It was a terrible gale, and for one whole day they were in real danger. Tarisio spoke of it to me with a shudder. I will give you his real words, for they struck me at the time, and I have often thought of them since.

"Ah, my poor Mr. Read, the bass of Spain was all but lost."

Was not this a true connoisseur? a genuine enthusiast? Observe! there was also an ephemeral insect called Luigi Tarisio, who would have gone down with the bass, but that made no impression on his mind. De minimis non curat Ludovicus.

He got it safe to Paris. A certain high-priest in these mysteries called Vuillaume, with the help of a sacred vessel, called the glue-pot, soon rewedded the back and sides to the belly, and the bass, being now just what it was when the ruffian Ortega put his finger in the pie, was sold for 20,000 f.

I saw the Spanish bass in Paris twenty two years ago, and you can see it any day this month you like; for it is the identical violoncello now on show at Kensington, numbered 188. Who would divine its separate adventures, to see it all reposing so calm and uniform in that case—"Post tot naufragia tutus."

On Singing in Tune and Singing out of Tune.

The fact of a note being out of tune may depend upon three causes; the impressions of the moment, the voice of the singer, and his ear. The note does not cease to be out of tune, but the consequences are very different from what they are in other cases, when the defect arises from the impressions of the moment, because, then, the defect may be corrected. Thus, fear, emotion, want of confidence in one's memory, a note emitted involuntarily, so to speak, with greater force than the artist intended, too much abandon in dramatic expression, want of acquaintance with the acoustic qualities of a building, and, lastly, any moral or physical suffering, are so many causes which may make a singer sing momentarily out of tune, and yet not justify us in accusing him of doing so habitually. I will go further than this: any artist, who, feeling that at the commencement of a melodic phrase he had pitched his voice a little too high, or a little too low, (for a singer with an ear is always aware of the fact) attempted to set himself right at once in the middle of the phrase, would find himself singing much more out of tune than a singer who had made up his mind to terminate the phrase as he had begun it, and not put himself right till a slight pause in the music enabled him to do so.

How many amateurs have I known—and, unfortunately, they are to be met with every day—who, after hearing an artist for the first time, have gone about everywhere proclaiming that he sang out of tune, because, not being in very good voice on the night they heard him, he had perhaps emitted two or three suspicious notes. Yes, such an assertion has been made in my presence regarding our greatest artistic celebrities in days gone by, regarding Lablache, Pasta, Ronconi, and Persiani.

One note is sufficient to make some persons assert that an artist sings out of tune; just as if he possesses every good quality except a particular one to which such and such an amateur is partial, it is precisely that very quality which is expected of him, while no credit is given him for all the qualities which he really does possess. I myself heard Adolphe Nourrit one day say: "If an artist were to be run down for singing badly once, twice, three times or even ten times, everybody would have to renounce all idea of becoming a singer." I have heard one of the greatest singers in the world, Davide, sing out of tune during an entire first act, and rise during the second to the most marvellous and sublime efforts. And why? Because, notwithstanding his prodigious greatness as an artist, he was under the influence of an insurmountable dread every time he appeared on the stage.

When the fact of singing out of tune arises from a defect, either natural, or in consequence of illness, in the vocal organ, it is not certainly impossible to correct it, but the task may prove a difficult one. In such a case, the person singing is perfectly aware that he is singing out of tune, without, however, being able to remedy the evil. The voice, under the circumstances, is exactly like a wind instrument which is not correct, because certain proportions have not been observed, either in its length or breadth, or in the size of the holes. The only remedy is to send the flute or clarinet back to the maker's to be rectified; unfortunately, there is no instrument maker to whom we can send our vocal organs to be repaired. If, therefore, after devoting the time necessary for going through every possible method of imparting certainty and strength to the voice, a singer perceives that he cannot succeed, the sole course left him is to give up all ideas of singing. Luckily, this is a rare case.

But if, lastly, singing out of tune arises from a want of ear, the evil is incurable, for it is, in such a case, simply by chance that the person sings; and he will be in the position of some artist or other of the Opera Comique, of whom Fiorentino facetiously said that: "He always sang above, below, or on one side of the note." But a professor should not be in too great a hurry to declare his pupil has no ear, for it is very possible that the mere absence of habit may cause the latter to be out of tune. Nature is so strange. Many an artist plays the piano or violin perfectly, and has a most delicately correct ear; yet if he tries to sing at sight, he will not hit two notes correctly. Another will sing in tune with a piano, but out of tune with an orchestra; and every one has, doubtless, like me, met amateurs whom the slightest want of correctness in the pieces executed before them will cause to start, and yet who will fearlessly sing out of tune themselves without perceiving it. Sound coming from within evidently produces, upon those who hear it, a different effect to that coming from without. Before deciding, therefore, whether a pupil has no ear, the master ought to make him go through all the studies intended to fix and impart certainty to the voice; he ought to familiarize him with every possible intonation, and not pronounce a sentence of condemnation until he is convinced that his pupil does not know whether he is singing in, or out of tune.

I once experienced an extraordinary fact of this kind. A young Italian lady, very pretty, and possessing a magnificent contralto, but without any musical education, desired to go upon the stage. Many professors were, as I was, seduced by her beautiful voice; I may mention among others M.M. Panofka, and Schimon. Schnelthoefner gave her a pianoforte and solfeggi mistress in the shape of a fair pupil of the Conservatory, but the mistress could never make the pupil feel when she executed the scale with its eight notes, when she gave only seven, or when she sent forth nine or ten. One day the pupil felt perfectly discouraged. Desirous of being convinced whether it was or was not an impossibility for her to sing, I resolved to devote a month to the task. During this month, I had the patience to make her practice only the first sixteen bars of Arsace's cavatina: "Ah! quel giorno!" striking the notes on the piano as she sang. At the end of the month, to test the progress she had made, I played the proper accompaniment. No one can possibly form the slightest conception of the strain with which she favored me; it was the most incredible pasticcio, hodge-podge, and jumble of the cavatina from Tancredi, the air from the Barbieri, the ballad from Fra Diavolo, and I know not what besides—in fact, it was something of everything except the cavatina of Arsace, of which she did not give one single note.

There was a prejudice, very general in former days, and not quite eradicated even now, that, supposing any one does sing out of tune, he had better sing too low than too high. Those who argue thus strangely, found their opinion upon the fact that singing too low denotes a certain weakness, either temporary, or more permanent, but which may disappear in course of time, while singing too high denotes an organic defect of the voice or the ear. Nothing can be less just than this argument. Singing too high, like singing too low, may arise from weakness just as well as from an organic defect. That a person's singing too high is frequently attributable to weakness is proved by the circumstance that if we pit in a duet two persons against each other, one with a delicate and the other with a very strong voice, and that if the former endeavors to hold his own against the latter, he will nearly always finish by going up. It has been remarked that French and Italian voices are more inclined to go down sometimes, while, on the contrary German voices display a tendency to rise. What does this prove? Nothing, except that Nature has sown some imperfection in all her works. Everyone knows that extremely high soprano voices exhibit a tendency to rise. I will go still further than this: I maintain that there does not exist in the world a soprano, singing easily the re, mi, and high fa, who does not accidentally rise. Ought this to expose to the charge of singing out of tune the artists who possess such voices? By no means!

Let us recapitulate. An artist sings out of tune, when the defect is an habitual one; when he is never sure of singing correctly one evening something he sang correctly on a previous evening; when, on one and the same occasion, his voice sometimes rises, and sometimes falls; when, in a word, his intonation, even though not invariably bad, constantly disturbs those who are listening to him. But a singer who happens in the course of an opera to emit a few doubtful notes, and that only once in two or three months, may yet be regarded as singing in tune. All the worse for those who go to hear him precisely on his bad days. I recollect its being formerly asserted that Mme. Damoreau, Nourrit, and Rubini, were the only singers who never were out of tune. I subscribe to this, and I could add several names very popular at the present day. However, if a leading artist, with a firmly established reputation for singing in tune, happens once in a way to miss a note, there are, among the public that detect the fault, many, who, unlike the amateurs I mentioned above, will not dare to confess the truth, even to themselves, but will be persuaded it is their own ear which is in fault.

Before, therefore, blighting the reputation of an artist, by the assertion that he sings out of tune, we ought to be quite certain whether he does so by mere accident, or habitually, and guard against being too severe in our judgment of him; but, on the other hand, we should not carry our deference to so high a pitch as the singing-mistress, who, not wishing to wound the feelings of her pupil, by telling her plainly she sang out of tune, mildly observed: "If, Mademoiselle, you would take your E slightly higher, my piano would be more in tune."

HENRY COHEN (Guide Musical.)

A MOZART MANUSCRIPT.—A sale of musical manuscripts took place recently in London, at which a Sonata of Mozart's, for violin and piano-forte, in the composer's autograph, was bid off for ten guineas. Mr. George Grove writes for The Athenæum an interesting account of this manuscript, which it seems has a curious history. It was written in 1784, to be performed at the Vienna Theatre, by Mozart and the violinist, Regina Strinasacchi, and the circumstances are thus related by Mozart's biographer, Otto Jahn:

"Mozart, in writing to his father about the new player, after saying how much he bore of her taste and expression, goes on to say: 'I am now writing a sonata, which we are to play together at her concert, on Thursday, in the theatre.' But the sonata was not ready in time, and it was only with great difficulty that Signora Strinasacchi obtained the violin part from Mozart on the evening before the concert. She had only the following morning to practice it in, and that by herself, for the composer and she first as one another at the concert itself. The performance was magnificent on both sides, and was received with the greatest applause. But the Emperor Joseph, who was in his box opposite the piano, thinking that he detected through his opera-glass that Mozart had no notes before him, sent for him to bring the sonata. What Mozart brought him was a blank piece of paper with merely the bars drawn upon it; for he had not found time to write down the piano part, and played the sonata (no part of which he had ever even heard) from memory."

To this Mr. Grove adds:

"The manuscript sold at Sotheby's for ten guineas, though now containing the complete work, was the identical paper which Mozart had before him on the desk: and the sight of it shows that Jahn's account is not absolutely correct. It was not blank paper with the mere bars; but contained the violin part, carefully written by Mozart himself throughout, and below it the staves for the piano forte, with here and there a bit of accompaniment figure or modulation, to guide him as he went along. These can be perfectly well made out, from the simple circumstances that the ink with which Mozart afterwards filled in the piano-forte part is much blander than that in which the violin part and the scattered memoranda just mentioned were written; so that it is easy to see exactly how the paper was when the Emperor looked down upon it from his box. The writing of the violin part is as graceful and easy as Mozart's ordinary hand; but owing to the accompaniment being sometimes florid, the notes of the piano part have often had to be crammed and squeezed in between the bars."

The complete Sonata, which is in B flat major, is well known in the modern concert room.

Young Mendelssohn in Paris.*

An important event in the young composer's life took place in 1825, when he went to Paris with his father to consult Cherubini as to his future career. Of his experiences during his visit to the gay city we have the following account from his own pen, and remembering that it was written when he was only sixteen years of age, it gives a remarkable illustration of his powers of observation:

"I had hoped," says he, "to find this the native home of music, musicians, and musical taste; but, upon my word, it is nothing of the kind. The salons, though I did not expect much from them, are wearisome; people care only for trivial, showy music, and won't put up with anything serious or solid. The orchestra (I have heard those of the Opera and the Académie Royale) are very good, but by no means perfect; and lastly, the musicians themselves are either dried up, or else do nothing but abuse Paris and the Parisians.

"At the concert at Tremont last Sunday, I heard Urbahn play some variations on the viola. He tunes it differently to the usual way, that is to say, fe, fe. This is very effective the first time you hear it, but still it is a bad plan, for the instrument loses the depth of the viola, without gaining the sweetness of the violin, while it is obviously only available in F major, or at best C major. After this Kalkbrenner played a new sextet of his own in A minor. The piano has quite the leading part, and the clarinet, cello, and do ble-bass merely accompany. There are some pretty things in it, but mostly taken from Hummel's septet, on which the piece is really modelled. He played very well, though with some untenderness, on account of the fearful and unbearable heat. Just before he began he turned to Herr, and said with a sweet smile, 'Play for me, and I promise to give you ten sous.' But Herr, smilingly stroking his black beard, answered with a smile, 'Nay, that would not be agreeable to the public.' 'I beg your pardon,' said Kalkbrenner with another smile.

"Yesterday we were at the Feydeau, and saw the last act of an opera of Catal's called 'L'Aubergiste,' and Auber's 'Léocadie.' The theatre is large, cheerful, and pretty; the orchestra very good; and if the fiddles are not as fine as those at the Opera Buffa, the basses and the wind and the ensemble are better; and the conductor stands in the middle. The singers do not sing badly, though they have no voices; their acting is lively and rapid, and the whole goes well together. But now for the chief thing, the composition. Of the first opera I will say nothing, for I only heard half of it, and that was poor and weak, though not without pretty, light melody; but the celebrated 'Léocadie,' by the celebrated Auber—anything so miserable you really cannot conceive. The story is taken from a wretched novel of Cervantes, wretchedly cooked up into an opera, and I could never have believed that so vulgar and objectionable a piece should not only hold its ground, but in a short time run through fifty-two representations before an audience of Frenchmen, who really have nice feeling and correct taste. To this novel, which belongs to Cervantes' wild period, Auber has made the most miserable tame music. I don't speak of there being no breadth, no life, no originality in the whole opera, and of its being patched together of alternate reminiscences of Cherubini and Rossini; I don't speak of there being no vestige of seriousness or spark of passion, no power, no fire in it, nor that in the greatest climaxes the singers have to make roulades and shakes and passages; but surely the favorite of the public, the pupil of Cherubini, a man with grey hair, might have been expected to know something about instrumentation, now that it has become so easy through the publication of the scores of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven! Not even that. Just fancy that out of the many pieces in the whole opera, there are perhaps three in which the piccolo does not play the chief part. The Overture begins with a trémolando in the strings, but very soon out pops the piccolo from the garret, and the bassoon from the cellar, and pipe away a melody between them. In the subject of the Allegro the strings have the Spanish accompaniment, and the piccolo tootles another air to it. Léocadie's first melancholy air, 'Pauvre Léocadie, il vaudrait mieux mourir,' is appropriately accompanied by a piccolo; the piccolo expresses the brother's rage, the lover's grief, and the peasant girl's joy—in short, the whole thing might be capitally arranged for two flutes and a Jew's harp ad libitum. Oh dear!

"You tell me also, Fanny, that I ought to set up for a reformer, and teach people to like Onslow, Reicha, Beethoven, and Sebastian Bach. I do that already, as far as I can. But recollect, my dear child, that the people here don't know a note of 'Fidelio,' and look upon Bach as a mere full-bottomed wig, powdered with nothing but learning.

"The other day, at Kalkbrenner's request I played Bach's organ preludes in E minor and A minor. The people thought them both sweetly pretty, and somebody remarked that the beginning of the A minor prelude bore a striking resemblance to a favorite duet of Montigny's (a French opera writer)!—everything danced before my eyes.

"At Mme. Klotz's a few days ago I played my E minor quartet with Ballot. He began quite in a careless, indifferent sort of way, but at a passage in the first part of the first movement he got into the spirit of the thing, and played the rest of the movement and the Adagio very well and with plenty of vigor. Then came the Scherzo: I suppose the opening of it pleased him, for he went off like anything, at a tremendous pace, the others after him, I trying to keep them back; but it's not much good trying to keep back three runaway Frenchmen. And so they carried me along with them, always madder and madder and faster and louder; and especially at one place near the end, where the subject of the Trio comes at the top, against the beat, Ballot lashed away in the most furious style, in a rage with himself because he had made the same mistake several times over. When it was finished, all that he said to me was, 'Encore une fois ce moroseau.' That time it went smoothly, but still more madly than the first time.

The last movement at first went like wildfire. At that part near the end where the subject comes in for the last time in B minor, quite fortissimo. Ballot sawed away at his strings in a perfect frenzy, so that I was almost frightened at my own quartet; and at the end, he came up to me, again without a word, and embraced me twice as if he wanted to strangle me. Rode also was very much pleased, and a long while afterwards, suddenly said to me in German: 'Bravo, mein Schatz!'

"Fanny, you write to me of prejudices and partiality, of growing and owlshness, and of the land flowing with milk and honey—as you call this Paris. Just reflect, I beseech you, are you in Paris, or am I! Surely I must know more about it than you. Is it my way to let myself be hampered by prejudices in my judgment of music? And even if it were, is Rode prejudiced when he says, 'C'est une dégringolade musicale!' Is Neukomm prejudiced when he says, 'C'est pas loi le pays des orchestres?' Is Herr prejudiced when he says, 'The public here can understand and appreciate nothing but variations?' and are thousands of others prejudiced when they swear at Paris? It is you who are so prejudiced that you believe my impartial statements less than the lovely picture of an Eldorado Paris that your own fancy has drawn. Take up the Constitutionnel, what are they giving at the Italian opera besides Rossini? Take up a music-catalogue, what is published or sold but romances and potpourris? Wait till you have been here and heard 'Alceste,' 'Robin de Bois,' and the soirées; or till you have heard the music in the King's Chapel, and then judge and scold, but not now when you are hampered as regularly blinded by prejudices. But forgive me for this Allegro ferocce.

"I have been busy these last days making a Kyrie à 5 voix and grandissimo orchestra; in bulk it surpasses anything I have yet written. There is also a tolerable amount of pizzicato in it, and as for the trombones, they will need good wind-pipes."

—Letters to his parents of the 18th and 22nd April, 1826.

PUBLISHERS' SONGS.—The London Athenæum says a young lady's singing powers are in a sorrowful state when she leaves school, but much is to be allowed for apprehensive instincts, timid and tremulous nerves. She knows she is no artist in song, and of that the publisher takes advantage. His sincerity is such, that he offers her too frequently imbecile nonsense, under the plea that it is "easy to sing." The normal requirements for a publisher's song are, no feeling, no fancy, no invention, no meaning, no power, no life, no sensibility, no sentiment. There is but one answer to Voltaire's query, "What does it ask for?" and that is, nothing. An English girl in a music-seller's estimation, is an ungraceful, pitiable being. She has no heart, no head; she is without sympathy or thought, without skill, voice, method, declamation or any power of captivating in an art which has, ever since the world began, stood foremost in its influence on humanity. Ballad-singing to our young ladies must be the most comfortable of all their young life's engagements, and to their auditors the most terrible affliction to be met with in social life.

5. EDUARD SOBOLEWSKI, a German composer of some eminence, who emigrated to this country in 1859, died at St. Louis in May last. From the New York Musik-Zeitung we translate the following account of his career.—

"He was born at Königsberg in Prussia, Oct. 1, 1804. In his thirteenth year he was already a virtuoso on his favorite instrument, the violin. At the age of seventeen he was established as first violinist in the orchestra of the Königsberg theatre, and at 23 he held the place of Kapellmeister to the same orchestra. There he remained until 1854, when he removed to Bremen, where he officiated as Kapellmeister in the Stadt theatre until his emigration in 1859 to the United States.

"In Königsberg Sobolewski had founded the Musical Academy there, which a few years ago celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary by the performance of some of its founder's works; and besides his onerous labors as conductor of the orchestra and as teacher of singing in the Academy, he also gave lectures on the theory of composition at the University.

"In the time of his residence in Königsberg and Bremen fall not only most of his musical productions in many forms, but also a multitude of musical treatises, criticisms and controversial writings, most of which appeared in the Leipzig musical journals, especially the 'Reactionary Letters' levelled against the new direction of Richard Wagner, which have been translated into nearly every language of the cultivated world.

"For his restless, busily creative spirit the Fatherland was too narrow; he could endure no longer his limited sphere of operation in the commercial city; and, filled with the fairest hopes for a free, unlimited field of activity in the new world, he came to the United States, where he first settled in Milwaukee. But here nothing but bitter disappointments were his lot. Without definite plan, without experience, without knowledge of the relations of the country, he had to submit himself to the advice of so-called friends, whose motives seemed to him benevolent or disinterested. At first he was made director of the Musical Society, which, utterly unable to appreciate Sobolewski's earnest striving, soon let him fall again, and even stirred up animosity against him, making his farther stay in that city impossible. To be sure, a Sobolewski was not the man for concerts in costume, with wreaths and dances, such as the Musical Society then cultivated. An artistic tour through America, which led him as far as Havana, turned out mournfully enough. This was in a great measure the fault of the programme, which had for its principal features his not easily understood monodrama 'Cleopatra,' and some songs from 'Hiawatha' melodramatically worked up by him. In Milwaukee he composed also his 'American National Opera: Mehoga, the Flower of the Forest,' and brought it out with the aid of the Musical Society, but without any particular success.

"From Milwaukee he removed to St. Louis, having accepted the invitation of the Philharmonic Society there to become its conductor. Here he worked industriously and perseveringly as director, music-teacher and composer until his death, which occurred on Sunday, the 18th of May, after only eight days sickness. Sobolewski, whom fortune has always treated in a very step-motherly way, leaves a family of ten children, of whom the youngest girl bears the name of his opera 'Comala.'

"Sobolewski has composed much, and among it some things that are good. His more important works are the Oratorios: 'John and the Redeemer' and 'Lazarus'; the operas: 'Salvator,' 'Imogen,' 'Velleda,' 'The Prophet of Korassan,' 'Zisca,' 'Comala,' 'Lagonia,' 'Mohaga'; the melo-dramas: 'Pyramion,' 'Cleopatra,' 'Orpheus,' 'Vivela,' and several more. Of all these works the only one with which we are nearly acquainted is the opera 'Mohaga,' and this is wanting above all in clearness and in characteristic, dramatic tone color; to the title of an 'American National Opera,' in spite of its subject borrowed from American history, it can scarcely lay claim.

"Brendel, who died a few years ago, the literary defender of Sobolewski in Germany, in spite of all his partiality for all 'musicians of the Future,' passes the following judgment upon this composer in his History of Music: 'Remarkable as a composer generally, as well as an opera composer specially, Sobolewski is at any rate. But in the works of his which I know he has not attained to clearness, to well-rounded completeness; and the same must be said of his operas. His desultory nature allows him—even in his literary manifestations—now to seize upon a good thought, and now to mingle with it what is decidedly unclear. It is no complete and self-contained individuality, that we have before us.'

"But not to give only a single judgment (though we conscientiously subscribe to it) upon the deceased, we may here cite an enthusiastic expression of Franz Liszt about the melodrama 'Vivela,' which appeared in the Zeitschrift für Musik in 1855:—'What a melancholy fate to see such splendid creations doomed to bloom and die in solitude because they sprang up in too high or too burning regions, and thus resemble those flowers of the desert or of unattainable mountain summits, to which the people do not climb to enjoy their peculiar fragrance, their full beauty!'

6. ROSAMUNDA PISARONI. The Athenæum records the death of this once famous singer, with the following sketch:

There are still living opera frequenters who can remember the glorious contralto, Signora Benedetta-Rosamunda Pisaroni, one of the plainest of women, but one of the greatest of artists. She was born in 1798, and died on the 6th ult., at Piacenza, her native city. In her seventy-ninth year. This artist, although born in France, was educated in Italy, and made her debut at Bergamo in 1811 as a high soprano, but lost her upper notes during a severe illness at Parma in 1818—small-pox—which greatly disfigured her. She then took to the contralto register. Meyerbeer, who in 1818 was travelling in Italy, heard her, and composed "Romilda e Costanza" expressly for her at Padua. At the San Carlo, in Naples, she sang in Rossini's "Riccardo e Zoraida," and Mercadante wrote "Lodolaka" for her in 1819. It was in October of that year that she created a furor by her Malcolm, in Rossini's "Donna del Lago." Meyerbeer again wrote for her "L'Eule di Granada" for Milan. In 1822, Lablache being included in the cast. In 1823 she sang in Rome and Lucina. At the last-mentioned city Pacini composed "Tamisiole" for her and Signora Tacchinardi (afterward Mme. Persiani). Her next engagements were at Bologna and Milan. It was at the Scala that she electrified her auditors, in 1825, by her Arsace in "Semiramide." After being at Genoa, Leghorn, Florence and Rome, Mme. Pisaroni went to Paris in 1827, making her debut as Arsace. The very first notes she sang, "Eccome alfin in Babilonia," roused the house in the same manner as Mme. Alboni did in 1847, at the opening night of the Royal Italian Opera, also as Arsace. In Paris Pisaroni sang with Pasta, Malibran and Sontag. What associations are connected with these great names! In their time the pure art of vocalization was in its perfection. It was in 1829 Pisaroni came to London, and at the King's Theatre, under the late Laporte's direction, made her debut there as Malcolm in the "Donna del Lago," Signor Donzelli (who is still living at Bologna) being the Roderick Otho. Despite her physical defects she brought down the house; her voice was not what it had been in Italy and France, but the genius of the artist was supreme. Her Isabella in Rossini's "Italiana in Algeri" was marked by much finish, and her acting was so excellent that the enthusiasm of her listeners knew no bounds. She subsequently played Arsace, first to the Semiramide of Sontag and next to that of Malibran. Pisaroni returned to Paris and Milan in 1830, but quitted the lyric stage in 1836, Turin being the last theatre where she appeared. She was a great artist in every sense of the word—historically as well as vocally: there was a grandeur and breadth of style which always commanded the attention and enlisted the sympathies of her hearers. She had the tact to identify herself completely with the character she was sustaining, and it is difficult to state whether she shone most as a tragedian or a comedian.

7. HENRI DRAYTON. Mr. Henri Drayton, the well-known opera singer, has died at his residence in New York. His death took place on the 30th ult. Though well known in England, where he made his reputation, Mr. Drayton was a citizen of the United States. He was born in Philadelphia in 1822, finished his musical education at the Paris Conservatoire, and soon afterwards was engaged as primo basso in the Italian Opera at Antwerp. Alfred Bunn engaged him for English opera in London, and here he played for many years with great success, excelling in such character parts as Devilshoof in "The Bohemian Girl," and making a reputation by his Bertram in "Robert," and Peter the Great in "L'Etoile du Nord." He visited the United States with his wife in 1859, and gave a series of popular entertainments, which he styled parlor operas. The Draytons returned to England in 1861. In 1869 Mr. Drayton was engaged by the Richings English Opera Company, and he sang with them for two seasons in New York and other cities, his best personation being Rip Van Winkle in Mr. Bristow's opera of that name. While travelling with the Richings company he had a stroke of paralysis at Rochester, about a year ago, and though he afterwards appeared on the stage with the Seguin company, this summer, at Bryant's Theatre, he never fully recovered his health. He had a second attack at his home, which has carried him off. Mr. Drayton was much esteemed in private life. He was not only a good musician, but an actor of ability and earnestness, and the author of several plays and operas.—Lond. Orchestra, Aug. 16.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 21, 1872.

Mr. Osgood's Concert.

At last a Concert! Our season opens, not in the "Hub" proper, to be sure, but in one of the "sub-hubs," Chelsea, which has been showing vigorous signs of zeal for music for a few years, through its Choral Society, its beautiful new theatre, or "Academy of Music," modelled somewhat after our "model theatre," the Globe,—and indeed for a long time past through the quiet influence and example of a single family, numerous and prosperous, residing there, every member of which, though only in an amateur way, is practically musical. One of the younger sons, a Harvard graduate of 1866, and the sweet singer of his class, blessed with a beautiful tenor voice and a truly musical nature, has since devoted himself to music, and by two long residences in Europe,—the first in Germany, the second both in Germany and Italy,—has availed himself of every advantage both of the best vocal teachers, and of the study of music as an art in the fullest sense, and has now returned thoroughly prepared to enter upon his professional career. Those who have known GEORGE L. OSGOOD musically in private, those who heard him sing in a Harvard Symphony Concert on his first return from Europe, when he loyally and gracefully laid the first fruits of his culture as it were upon the altar of his Alma Mater, do not need to be convinced of his fine musical endowments, not only of voice, but of intellect and soul. Every one felt the refinement of his singing; the only question was of power of voice, and of endurance, for singing in large halls. In this respect, as well as in the whole economy and mastery of means, and all the arts and qualities which make up a good singer, a real gain, the fair reward of so much conscientious, patient, well-directed study, was to be expected now. All the reports of his recent public efforts in Germany had given us assurance of it.

One thing is highly creditable to Mr. Osgood, considering the temptation and the fashion of the times. Almost every young man or woman, who goes abroad for vocal training (and their name is Legion), is almost certain to be sucked into the whirling limbo of Italian Opera, or mongrel opera that calls itself Italian; and then follows the poor commonplace career of figuring on the stage in the same worn out round of characters, Lucias and Traviatas, Edgars and Manricos, each vainly straining and striving, if not to revivify those old ghosts, at least to borrow some reflected lustre from them by identifying herself or himself with parts which memory couples with great artists. The worst of it is, that in this pursuit, this travelling in a banal circle, spell-bound, hopeless in most cases, the deluded victim denies himself the real nourishing, inspiring and ennobling wine and pabulum of music in the high sense of Art; his musical culture and his musical taste becomes of the most superficial. Rarely does the average Italian opera singer appreciate, or care to sing, even for his own private satisfaction, those songs which spring from the wells of deep and spiritual genius, songs by Schubert, Schumann, Franz,—still less the lofty sustained melody of the greatest priests of song and harmony, like Bach and Handel; even Mozart they accept in a half-hearted spirit of concession. Mr. Osgood has had the good sense and the courage to resist the current, and to choose another and a manlier direction, showing that he understands himself, and that he cheerfully and earnestly acknowledges the duty of the artist first of all to the ideal of pure Art, and not first of all to the most ready popular success, though Art thereby should be degraded. He has prepared himself to be a concert and an oratorio singer; and this, too, not in the superficial ordinary sense of miscellaneous concert singing, but in the far nobler sense of making himself a true interpreter of what there is most pure and beautiful and noble in the best repertoire of song,—an interpreter of such masters as we have named, not excluding, of course, the melodies best worth perpetuating from Italian, English and whatever sources. Mr. Osgood has made himself particularly intimately at home in the speciality of German Lied singing. He has enjoyed the friendship and inspiring influence of Robert Franz in person, as well as in his music. And we are glad to know, therefore, that he intends, after the completion of his engagement with Theodore Thomas, say in the month of May, to give us a series of classical song matinées or soirées, in which we shall hear him, and hear his masters, to the best advantage, coming nearer to the soul of all their art than we can in large general concerts.

The concert in that beautiful Chelsea "Academy" last Wednesday evening, was the welcoming of Osgood in the town that claims him, and his first public appearance since his return from Europe.

The auditorium was filled with the singer's friends and fellow citizens of Chelsea, by whom the compliment was tendered, besides a considerable delegation of leading musical persons from Boston, whom a deep interest in the occasion drew there in spite of the bad weather. This was the programme:

Overture to Semiramide.....	Rossini.
Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
"O, I'm a Roamer." Song for Bass, from the "Sonn and Stranger".....	Mendelssohn.
Mr. M. W. Whitney.
Tenor Serenade "Ecco ridente il cielo," from the "ber of Seville".....	Rossini.
Mr. Geo. L. Osgood.
"Souvenir de Spa." Solo for Violoncello.....	Servais.
Mr. Hennig.
"The Young Mountaineer".....	Randegger.
Mr. Whitney.
"Träumerei" (Reverie).....	Schumann.
Quintette Club.
"Erking".....	Schubert.
Mr. Geo. L. Osgood.
The Celebrated Adagio, "God save the Emperor," Quartet, No. 77.....	Haydn.
Quintette Club.
"Slumber on Gently".....	Rob. Franz.
Mr. Geo. L. Osgood.
Finale. 1st Act of Euryanthe.....	Von Weber.
Quintette Club.

The selections given by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, with the exception of the "celebrated" Adagio and Variations by Haydn, were hardly worthy of the occasion, or of a Club which properly is nothing if not classical, and which has looked upon itself as "the exponent" of such music for so many years. Surely some real Quartet or Quintet movements would have been quite as acceptable within two miles of Boston and to an essentially Boston audience as thin arrangements of a light overture, &c. The club is well made up, having filled the places of Mr. Fries and Mr. Meisel with two excellent artists: Mr. HENNING (cello) and Mr. HAMM (violin). Instead of Semiramide they opened the concert with a light, old-fashioned, Frenchy overture, sometimes heard in theatres. The well-worn "Träumerei," Mr. RYAN's clarinet taking the melody, was followed by the fresh little Scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony"; but in both we would have preferred a piano (in the second a four-hand arrangement) to so thin, and for that very reason not particularly delicate a substitute for an orchestra. Thomas plays the Träumerei with only strings, a mass of them, and that comes nearer to a delicate and true translation of the little pianoforte poem. However, perhaps we are over-critical, for it was all bright and pleasing to the popular ear no doubt; the Euryanthe piece was as agreeable as any of their selections. Mr. RUDOLPH HENNING, in his rendering of a rather superficially sentimental show piece, showed himself a rare master of his instrument, playing with a rich, smooth, even tone throughout, great ease and grace of execution, and pure, genuine expression. Mr. WHITNEY was warmly welcomed back after a year of very marked success, interrupted by a long period of severe illness, in England. His great bass voice seemed nobler and grander than ever, while the higher tones have grown more musical and rich. He has gained so much, too, in artistic delivery and phrasing, and sings with so much more vitality, that we shall be glad to hear him in music of a grander style more suited to his individuality. The rapid, merry buffo song from Mendelssohn's "Heinrich" was given with ease, distinctness and vivacity, nicely accompanied on the piano by Mr. GRANER, just from Dresden, who, we understand, is engaged for that service in the Thomas concerts. The rather conventional, English song by Randegger was very finely sung and much enjoyed; but Randegger has done greater things than that.

Mr. OSGOOD, hearty as was the greeting that awaited him, came forward under not the most propitious circumstances. The place is not encouraging to the voice, nor very good for hearing (like most theatres, not built for concerts) either of the singing voice or the piano; and the first public effort before one's old neighbors, the conscientiousness of the indefinitely much expected, &c., &c., naturally embarrassed him a little at the outset. For this reason we doubt the wisdom of choosing such a piece as "Ecco ridente," the exquisite florid melody which will always recall Mario in his prime, for the first effort; would it not have been better to have got warmed up to that song by degrees? For a little while the voice was disappointing, the tone somewhat dry and paralyzed by nervousness; but as he went on, the golden sweetness of the voice, its delicate, interior, soulful quality came out freely and warmly; and the fresh, genial summer night melody was sung with such fine phrasing, such liquid, even flow of melody (with rare and slight exceptions), so pure an Italian style, and so much light and shade and truth of feeling that all were delighted. (And here, by the way, we do see a good artistic motive in placing the Italian selection first). Many voices we may hear that have more weight and volume, more brilliancy, more ringing resonance, but very rarely one so sweet, so purely musical, with so much soul and native true refinement in it. Recalled, the singer sang (what was justifiable there and then if anywhere) "Sweet Home," with beautiful simplicity and unaffected feeling. In Schubert's "Erl King" the singer was more in his own field; and, although very familiar, the selection was a good one as giving scope for the true declamatory German ballad style. And indeed his musical declamation was most admirable, wonderfully distinct in the enunciation, at times startlingly graphic, contrasting the voices well, steadily growing to a climax, yet all in good keeping and leaving the impression of a complete, consistent and artistic whole. We do not think we ever heard the song so powerfully interpreted to feeling and imagination, although sometimes with greater power of voice. Mr. Osgood sang it in English, securing the excellent translation on the programme to one who would be happy could he claim its authorship, but it was made by Dr. Hodge. For an encore this time he sang a simple, pleasing sentimental song of his own composition.

Of Robert Franz he sang the lovely Schlummerlied from Tieck (his own translation). For a single specimen of Franz it is not precisely the one we would have chosen, and indeed it is but fair to Franz to sing a group of two or three of his songs instead of only one, though that one is longer than most of them. Yet it is one of the most delicate, original, poetical of lullabies, the music fully worthy of the words; and the style in which it was sung showed a fine sensibility and a beautiful, subdued, sustained and even character of song. It was, however, taken too slow at the start (the accompanist perhaps not being yet entirely at home with Franz), so that the natural fervor of the song was not felt; this fault was remedied after the first stanza. The impression made, upon the whole, of Mr. Osgood's singing fully answered expectation, and all came away happy in the possession of such an artist.

Music in New York.—Thomas's Garden Concerts.—What Next?

New York Sept. 14.—The summer nights' concerts at the Central Park Garden will soon be ended, but the attendance there still continues undiminished, and the music is as good as ever. From a quantity of programmes before me I give a list of pieces performed by Thomas's Orchestra during the 115 concerts, up to Wednesday, Sept. 4.

SYMPHONIES.—Eight (entire) Beethoven's; First, in B flat, Schumann; Larghetto of Second, Beethoven; Andante of Fifth, Beethoven; Allegretto of Seventh, Beethoven; Andante of First, Beethoven; Andante of "Surprise," Haydn; Scherzo of Symphony No. 3, B flat, Schumann; Scherzo of "Reformation Symphony," Mendelssohn; Scherzo of "Scottish" Symphony, Mendelssohn; Andantino and Tempo di Marcia, Spohr; Andante and Scherzo from Symphony in C, Schubert; Adagio: "Ocean Symphony," Rubinstein.

OVERTURES.—Bal Masqué, Adam; Roi d'Ivetot, Adam; Deux Journées, Cherubini; Der Portugiesische Gasthof, Cherubini; Anacorete, Cherubini; Tannhäuser, Wagner; Rienzi, Wagner; Overture in C, op. 115, Beethoven; Weihe des Hauses, op. 124, in C, Beethoven; Coriolanus, Beethoven; Leonora, No. 3, Beethoven; King Stephen, Beethoven; Fidelio, Beethoven; Schauspieldirector, Mozart; Magic Flute, Mozart; Don Giovanni, Mozart; Manfred, Schumann; Iphigenia in Aulis, Gluck; Semiramis, Rossini; La Caza Lutra, Rossini; Barber of Seville, Rossini; William Tell, Rossini; Rosamunda, Schubert; Macbeth, Auber; Fra Diavolo, Auber; Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn; Athalia, Mendelssohn; Fingal's Cave, Mendelssohn; Der Freischütz, Weber; Oberon, Weber; Buryanthe, Weber; Vestal, Spontini; Martha, Flotow; Stradella, Flotow; Robert le Diable, Meyerbeer; Zampa, Herold; Fille du Régiment, Donizetti; Jaconda, Spohr; Robespierre, Litolff; Lurline, Wallace; Mignon, A. Thomas; Life for the Czar, Glilka; Dame Kobold, Raff; [Reincke?]; Merry Wives of Windsor, Nicolai.

Among the miscellaneous selections which have found most favor, are the following:

Extracts from the Operas of Lohengrin, Tannhäuser, and the "Flying Dutchman," by Wagner; "Invocation to the Alpine Fay," from Schumann's Manfred; Nocturne, Scherzo and March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Paraphrase: Loreley, Neavada; Adagio, Scherzo and March, op. 101, Raff; Quartet from Rigoletto; Ballet: "Rodeo de Saba," Gounod; Scherzo, op. 19, Goldmark; Music to Egmont, Beethoven; Ave Maria, Gounod; Amaryllis: Air par le Roi Louis XIII.; Abandoned, Schumann; Selections from Freischütz, Weber; Selections from Romeo and Juliet, Gounod; besides numberless Strauss Waltzes, selections from operas, &c.

This list is necessarily incomplete, embracing only a part of the season; but it will help your readers to form an idea of the high character of the selections with which Mr. Thomas has favored his auditors.

Mention should be made of a spirited Opening March composed by Theo. Thomas, which was played at one of the concerts, and also of two Galops, ("Japanese" and "Red Cloud") by our accomplished and well known pianist, A. H. Pease. So popular have these two pieces proved that they have been played at least a score of times during the season.

These concerts will be continued until Sept. 22, when the garden will close for the season, and Thomas will depart with his Orchestra for a Western tour. He has scrupulously adhered to a high standard in the selections played during the summer, and has undoubtedly done much to elevate the popular taste. He will probably give several Symphony Concerts at Steinway Hall during the winter. Mr. Geo. R. Osgood will accompany him on his western tour.

The musical season which is soon to open is by far the most promising which we have ever known, and I will give a list of the announcements which are already made.

Italian Opera will begin at the Academy of Music Sept. 30, under the management of Messrs. Maretzek and Jarrett. The prime donne are Mme. Pauline Lucca and Miss Kellogg, and the roles are divided as follows: Mme. Lucca is to appear as Selika in L'Africaine, Valentine in Les Huguenots, Leonora in Il Trovatore, Zerlina in Don Juan, Agatha in Der Freischütz, Mignon in Thomas's Opera of that name, Leonora in La Favorita, Cherubino in Le Nozze di Figaro, and Zerlina in Fra Diavolo.

Miss Kellogg will appear as: Violetta in La Traviata, Lucia in Lucia di Lammermoor, Annetta in Crispino, Martha in Martha, Gilda in Rigoletto, Amina in Sonnambula, Catarina in L'Etoile du Nord, and will also appear in Gounod's Mireille, Flotow's L'Ombre and Petrella's "Duchess of Amalfi," which are among the novelties promised.

The other singers are Mlle. Rosine Leveille, Soprano; Señora Sans, Contralto; Sigs. Abruguedo and Viziani, tenors; Sigs. Moriani and Sparapani, baritones; Jamet and Coulon, basses; and Sig. Ronconi, buffo. The orchestra consists of 49 performers, and the chorus of 68 voices. Great things are promised in the way of dresses, scenery, &c., and it is to be hoped that, in these matters, there will be some improvement upon the last season.

The ice will be broken (metaphorically speaking) by Mr. Max Strakosch at Steinway Hall, on Monday evening, Sept. 16, with Carlotta Patti and Mario. The lady, as we all know, has a wonderful executive faculty, but Mr. Strakosch claims that during her absence she has developed a broad, earnest, emotional style of singing. If this be true, who will say that the days of miracles are ended?

It will be interesting to hear Mario, even though we miss the wonderful voice which for so many years made him the reigning tenor of Europe. That we cannot expect to hear; but a great artist we certainly shall hear, and we may take a lesson in generosity from the English, who will listen to their favorite singers, years after they should have left the stage forever, with a manifest pleasure which must be purely retrospective.

The above named artists, with Mlle. Teresa Carreno, pianiste; Miss Anne Louise Cary, contralto; and Mons. Emile Lanerot, violinist, comprise the concert troupe. They will give three evening concerts and one matinée here, next week, and will then leave the city, to return later in the season. The Orchestra will be under the direction of Mr. S. Behrens.

Anton Rubinstein will play at Steinway Hall, September 23d. As a pianist he is said to rival Liszt, and as a composer, he has but one living equal. Shortly after his arrival here he was serenaded by the Philharmonic Society. The selections played were: the Andante to Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Wagner's Rienzi Overture, and Meyerbeer's Fucl-tanz. For the Rubinstein Concerts we are indebted to the enterprise of Mr. Grau, who has also engaged Henry Wieniawski, the well-known Polish violinist. The vocalists are Mlle. Louise Liebhart, from London, and Mlle. Ormeni.

The stimulus of these great musical enterprises is everywhere felt, and the season will be one of unusual activity on the part of our established musical organizations, concerning which I will write in future.

A. A. C.

ANECDOTE OF WIEPRECHT. From the Berlin Staatsbürger Zeitung we translate the following droll reminiscence of the late famous director in chief of the Prussian military bands, of whom we told what little we knew in our last number. (By a rare coincidence, one of the daily papers, the Globe, a few days later told its readers what it knew about Wieprecht in precisely the same words we had used. "In the month of two witnesses," &c., &c.):

"Wieprecht, besides his other offices, was also one of the founders and always a member of the 'Baltischer Officier-Orchester-Verein.' In the year 1864 Herr von Hülsen arranged a theatrical performance for a charity in the concert hall of the Royal Theatre. Three one-act pieces were given in the French language. All the performers belonged to the nobility; even the part of the servant, who had nothing to do but bring the candles and set the chairs, was taken by a 'marquise.' Victor von Magnus had a lover's part and played with distinguished success. The only not noble one was Julius Hein, who had the honor of dressing up the company. The entrée was two Friedrichs d'or. Herr von Hülsen in one of the pieces was a commis voyageur, and in a couplet of his own composing he described the joys and miseries of a court theatre Intendant so vividly, that he was wildly applauded and recalled several times. Nothing in this 'noble comedy' had a more motley and unique appearance than the orchestra. Officers of all grades, infantry, artillery and cavalry, all in gala uniform, made music here. An old major wielded the baton; a spruce captain of Hussars, with huge whiskers, blew the clarinet; a very long lieutenant of the Guards beat the kettle-drums; a Colonel of Uhlans played the viola, &c.

"To this society belonged also Wieprecht. I shall never forget the image he then presented. He wore the gala uniform coat with the stiff straight collar, on which the five lines of the staff were sewed in gold; he sat with his throat thus enclosed like a Spanish criminal in the garotte, his face very red. Thus he stood, and thus he drew the bow—of the double-bass. One cannot imagine anything more comical than 'father Wieprecht' in gala uniform playing the double-bass! The King and Queen had their seats close to the orchestra, so that they could reach into it with their hands. Wieprecht gave the military greeting, the King thanked him, but laughed more heartily than almost ever in his life before. The Queen, too, nodded friendly to Wieprecht, then turned away and placed her handkerchief before her mouth, for fear of laughing out aloud. But Wieprecht did not allow himself to be distracted; he played a solo, written by himself for the double-bass, with such purity and expression, that he was vehemently applauded. The whole royal family joined in the applause, and when the piece was finished, the king reached into the orchestra, seized the old Wieprecht's hand, and shook it heartily. The happiness of the brave music director at this distinction was visible upon his face,—it was perfectly himmel-blau."

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG.—On the 7th instant, the well-known University Vocal Association, Paulus, celebrated its fiftieth anniversary by a concert of sacred music in the University Church of St. Paul. The first piece was Mendelssohn's overture to St. Paul, performed by the bands of the Theatre and the Gewandhaus. Mme. Prechka-Leutner sang the air, "Auf starkem Fittig," from Haydn's Creation; Herr Lauterbach played a Violin Air-o-o, by Riets; Herr Grützmacher, a Violoncello Air by Bach; and Dr. Kratschmar, an Organ-Toccata, by the same composer. The choral pieces were: the chorale, "Wachet auf," as harmonized by Jac. Prätorius; "O, bone Jesu," Palestrina; "Miserere," Orlando Lassus; Fragments from Cherubini's Requiem; "Agnus Dei," Jul. Otto; "Danklied," Riets; Mendelssohn's "Ad Vesperas, Dom. xxi. p. Trinitat.," "Hymn for double Chorus," Franz Schubert; and the Motet, "Verwelfe nicht," R. Schumann. The concert was followed by a grand banquet in the Schützenhaus. Professor Osterloh proposed the health of the "Emperor William, the Victorious," and of "King John, the Learned." Professor Zarncke, Dr. Weber, and Dr. Döhner, presented Dr. Langer, the Director of the Association, with a silver laurel-wreath. Dr. Ferdinand Hiller, who is an honorary member, made a speech on the relation of the Producer to the Reproducer. Other speeches followed.—On the following day, there was a concert of profane music in the new Theatre, which was crammed. With the exception of Beethoven's "Leonore Overture," No. 3, and his Triple Concerto, Op. 56 (performed by Herren Reincke, Lauterbach and Grützmacher), and of Schubert's "Wanderer," the programme comprised exclusively compositions by honorary members of the Association. Among them were: "Morgenhymne," M. Bruch; "Walpurgis der Mönche," and the sixth scene from Frühling, Ferdinand Hiller;

"O-termogen," for soprano, male chorists, and orchestra, and "Zur Weisheit," Georg Vierling; "Der Jäger Heimkehr," C. Reinecke, and Horace's ode, "Ad Thalliarum," Vincenzo Lachner.—A very pretty surprise was prepared for Mme. Peschka-Leutner on her first re-appearance in Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor after her return from America. Friendly hands changed her dressing-room into an arbor of flowers. Magnificent bouquets with congratulatory cards from the first families of the town, covered the table, while on a violet velvet cushion there lay a massive silver laurel-wreath, bearing the following inscription: "To Mme. Peschka-Leutner, our highly esteemed and universally popular artist, this wreath is respectfully offered on her return, covered with glory, from foreign lands."

THE HAGUE.—A society has been formed here for the purpose of making the music of Sebastian Bach better known. The first public performance will be in October.

COLOGNE.—Dr. Ferdinand Hiller is at work on an Opera for the new Cologne theatre.

PARIS.—It is confidently stated that Mme. Rouzaud (Christine Nilsson) is preparing to assume the chief part, Eros, in the Psyche of Ambroise Thomas, which he has transformed into a larger work for the Grand Opera.

VIENNA.—The opera season was opened with Faust, in which Miss Minnie Hauck, owing to the sudden illness of the prima donna, was called to take the part of Marguerite, and did it with brilliant success.

MUNICH.—The report that Hans von Bülow had been made "General Intendant" of the Royal Opera, the highest musical post in the kingdom, is contradicted.

A clever knave has been trading upon the benevolence of the music-loving Bavarians by means of his adopting a high-sounding name in musical annals. Styling himself "Ludwig von Beethoven," and stating that he was a relative and namesake of that great composer, the man had the audacity to solicit assistance from the young King of Bavaria, whose love of everything connected with the immortal Beethoven induced him to give at different times sums amounting in all to £80 to this new Mr. Beethoven. The truth of his assertions being doubted, and inquiries proving them to be false, the police took measures for his arrest, but were unsuccessful, their bird had flown—the second Beethoven was no more. The rogue has been tried in the police court of Munich, in contempt, of course, and sentence delivered.

MILAN.—At the final performance of Cenerentola at the Fossati, on which occasion Miss Matilda Phillips, sister of Miss Adelaide Phillips, took her benefit—the theatre was crowded in all parts, and the very respectable audience honored the talented young lady with frequent and hearty expressions of approval during the performance of the opera. Between the second and third acts the beneficiaria sang the "Di tanti palpiti" (Tosca) in such a way as to create something very like enthusiasm.

—Signor Cagnoni's latest opera, "Papa Martin," has been successfully produced at the Politeama. Signor Braga's opera, "Gli Avventurieri," and an entirely new work, "Gara d'Amore," by Signor Bianchi, are announced at the same theatre. When the two new theatres, the Teatro del Verme, otherwise Teatro Donizetti, and the Teatro della Commedia, otherwise the Teatro Goldoni, are completed, as they shortly will be, this city will contain fourteen theatres, namely: the Scala, the Canobbiana, the Carcano, the Santa Radegonda; the Fossati, the Fuoro Re, the Milanese, the Teatro d'Estate, the Flando, the Goldoni, and the Donizetti.

LONDON.—Signor Randegger is said to be engaged in the composition of a new dramatic Cantata for the Birmingham Festival of 1873. It is entitled "Fridolin," the libretto being an adaptation from Schiller's "Der Gang zum Eisenhammer."—Randegger is not coming to America this season, as it has been reported. Arthur Sullivan, too, is commissioned to compose an Oratorio, and Signor Schira a Cantata, for the Birmingham Festival.

The action of the South Kensington authorities in the matter of the Albert Hall Choral Society has resulted in the formation of a new association which is to be named after its conductor and is to be termed "Gounod's Choir." The number of voices is to be limited to 240, divided as follows: 70 sopranor, 40 altos, 60 tenors, and 70 basses. The conductor is to possess sole administrative authority, but he is to be aided in the general business arrangements by a committee of members. The season extending from November to May will include a weekly rehearsal on Tuesday evening, and a series of Saturday evening concerts at S. James's-hall. All the proceeds arising from the regular concerts will be devoted to a fund for organizing an orchestra. M. Gounod in his announcement of the project says that his sole object in entering upon it is the advancement of art, and that Mrs. Weldon has promised to aid him in the instruction of the choir in the art of English pronunciation.

FESTIVALS.—The Standard of Aug. 31, says:

The Worcester Festival is to be held on the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 18th of September. The usual services at the cathedral will be suspended, and a special morning service will be held daily at half-past eight o'clock, when the Worcester Choir will be supplemented by the members of those from Gloucester and Hereford Cathedrals. The services selected are: Garrett in D, Croft in A, Smart in F, and Wesley in F. The Anthems will be—Praise the Lord, Sir John Goss; Hear my Prayer, Norris; Blessing and Glory, Bach; and Joy cometh in the morning, Hallah. The sermon will be preached by Dr. Barry, of King's College. On Tuesday "Elijah" will be given; in the evening there will be a miscellaneous concert in the College Hall: the first part of this will include Mozart's C-minor symphony, and selections from his operas "Idomeneo" and "Don Giovanni." A popular programme is promised for the second part "Samson," Hummel's second mass, and Haydn's "Creation," are the items for Wednesday morning, (too long, we maintain.) In the evening a selection from "L'Allegro and Il Penseroso," songs by Schöber, and Mendelssohn's little-known "Cornelius March" will be given. On Thursday Bach's "Passion Music," and the "Lobgesang" is provided; Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" is the chief feature of the evening concert. On Friday morning, the "Messiah" will bring the festival to a close. The singers announced are Miss Tillet, Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mme. Patey, Miss Alice Fairman, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Lewis Thomas. Mr. Salton will lead the band, and Mr. Donne, Mr. G. Townsend Smith and Dr. Wesley, as usual, respectively occupy the three posts of conductor, accompanist, and organist. The Rev. T. L. Wheeler and Mr. E. J. Spark are the honorary secretaries, and the list of stewards is as strong as ever, despite Lord Dudley and his golden bait. We regret that no new work has been commissioned for the meeting; en passant, it may be remarked that the usual hall will not take place.

Norwich is more vigorous than Worcester, and at the eighteenth triennial festival of the old eastern city, several novelties and comparatively new works are to be brought forward. From September 16th until the 20th (inclusive) has been fixed for the musical meeting. On Monday evening, Mr. Sullivan's "Te Deum" and Haydn's "Creation" are to be given. On Tuesday evening Mr. Macfarren's new cantata "Outward Bound," composed expressly for the occasion; a new festival overture by Mr. F. H. Cowen, and a capital miscellaneous selection are down for performance. "Elijah" will occupy Wednesday morning, and a varied selection will be given in the evening. Among these items we note, "Rhineland," a new scene with chorus by Dr. Bennett, the clever assistant organist of the cathedral; the Andante and Rondo from Sir Julius Benedict's pianoforte concerto in E flat, and an Andante for the clarinet, written by Miss Alice M. Smith. On Thursday morning the Oratorio of "St. Peter" will be performed for the first time in Norwich. Thursday evening will be occupied with another miscellaneous selection, the most noteworthy pieces in which are, Mendelssohn's "Capriccio Brillant," an Allegro and Scherzo from a new symphony by Sir Julius Benedict, and "Hedymion," a new overture by Mr. King Hall, who also figures as the solo pianist. On Friday morning, the Norwich Festival, like the Worcester, will conclude with the immortal "Messiah." A dress ball will take place at St. Andrew's Hall in the evening. The principal vocal performers are Miss Tietjens, Mme. Cora de Wilhorst, Miss Albani, Mme. Patey, Mme. Trebelli Bettini, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Kerr Gedge, Mr. J. G. Patey, and Mr. Santley. M. Salton will be the principal first violin; Sir Julius Benedict will be the conductor, and Dr. Bennett will preside at the organ. The band is complete in all departments, and the chorus will number 311 voices.

Sir Michael Costa has left London, on a tour in France, Italy, and Germany, to study the present condition of the lyrical drama in those countries. Sir Michael probably contemplates action as regards National Opera and musical education in England. At present the former is confined to the Crystal Palace, where it is chiefly represented by what are facetiously called "operas in English," which, being translated, means that adaptations of German, French, and Italian lyric dramas are in the ascendant. Auber's "Diamant de Couronne" has been followed by Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia": the principal parts are sustained by Mme. Ida Gillies Corri and Miss Palmer, Messrs. Nordblom, Cotte, Beale, Tempest, Walsh, Stanley, Müller, Wakefield, and H. Corri.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC,

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- A Song of the Sea. 4. D minor to f. Boott. 30
"I cried, 'how it comes with its stately tread,
And its dreadful voice, and the splendid pride
Of its royal garments flowing wide."
A song of the "sea waves," almost gloomy at times, but at the same time rich and powerful.
- Rose of the Valley. 3. C to g. Baxter. 30
"Breath of the midnight! Star of the sea!
Say is my loved one dreaming of me."
Has a very attractive chorus.
- Kiss me in my Dreams. 8'g and Cho. A to f. Gorham. 30
"All my slumbering moments, with thy vision teases, Then kiss me in my dreams, darling" and welcome. The subject is quite taking, and the song with the chorus is fitted to be popular.
- Papa's Come. Song & Cho. 3. A to g. Geary. 30
"Two little feet would patter run,
A sweet, and silvery voice cry, Papa's come."
Simple and sweet, but not too simple. These darling home songs contrast refreshingly with the marked love-ballads which constituted the staple a few years ago.
- Lady of my Love. 3. E♭ to f. Sargent. 30
"Not fairer is day
Than the lady of my love!"
A song quite as fair as the day, and sure to please a "fair lady."
- A Starry Night for a Ramble. 3. B♭ to d. Bagnale. 30
Comic and pretty.
- Grant us another Term. Song and Chorus. 3. C to e. Parkhurst. 30
"And Grant shall be our President Until the work is done."
A good campaign song on the Grant side. Get it for the remaining political meetings.
- A Maiden plied her busy wheel. 3. E♭ to e. Vandewater. 35.
An expressive piece.
- Bathing in the Tide. Song & Dance. 3. C to e. Brakam. 30
"In the surf a girl divine."
A ballad of Long Branch, with lively melody and dance. Very good of its class.

Instrumental.

- Horace Greeley Campaign Music. Greeley's Grand March. 2. G. Krummacker. 40
A first rate March, with an excellent title-portrait of Horace G., whose face is really too good-looking to be caricatured.
- Barbiers de Seville. 4 hds. 3. G. Beyer. 75
A few favorite airs from the opera, easily arranged.
- Greeley's Galop. With portrait. 3. A. Beda. 40
A very wide awake affair, which will be played long after it has served for the gallop to the polls of the adherents of the famous journalist.
- Ripples, for Piano. 4. A♭. Mrs. Ernest. 40
Very neat and sweet, having the pretty effects of more difficult "murmuring wave" and "fountain" pieces, without being out of the reach of common players.
- May Breezes. Mazurka Caprice. 3. A. Guinet. 30
A simple, pleasing and brilliant mazurka.
- My Star. (Mein Stern). 3. E♭. Kafka. 40
In the style of a song of rich melody, with variations.
- May Lily. 1. C. Smallwood. 25
One of 12 Rondos, the set being called "Flowers of May." Note the name, as so easy and so good pieces are "scarce."
- Baratta's Grand March. 3. A. Baratta. 30
Miss Baratta has succeeded finely in this composition, which is effective and brilliant.
- Amaranth Polka. 3. C. Vandewater.
Very pretty, neat and crisp.
- Blondine Valse. 3. G. Burgmüller. 40
Of smooth, gliding character. Very satisfactory every way.

- EXERCISES ELEMENTAIRES GRADUES. Graded Exercises for the Development of the Voice. By Mathilde Castrone Marchesi. 2.00
The exercises are similar to those found in other good methods, but have the merit of being carefully graded by a practical teacher, and as all can be transposed at will to suit the compass of each person's voice, they will be found widely useful.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, E flat, &c. a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Moscheles in London.

[We translate a few passages from the Life of Moscheles, edited from his letters and journals by his widow. We begin with his first arrival in London, near the end of May, 1821.]

—But Moscheles did not know,—nor could he ever dream that London was to be his second home. Here, in the metropolis of the great island kingdom, as just before in the world's city Paris, he plunged, full of youthful fire, into the midst of the musical and salon life. He wanted, above all, to hear and to be heard; and London offered him as many opportunities as Paris. Artists on his instrument, like J. B. Cramer, F. Ries, Kalkbrenner, stepped into the lists with him; men like Clementi sat among the judges. (Moscheles at that time played by preference on the Clementi pianos, which bore the name of Clementi and Co., and this name was a guaranty of the goodness of the instruments, although the business of the house was carried on by the two brothers Collard.)

About his colleague Cramer Moscheles writes:—"He murmurs his Mozart and his own Mozart like compositions, without any ill-will to me and my bravura; nay, both in public and in private he pays me the sincerest tribute of recognition, which I with equal sincerity return. I am a friend in his family, and am very grateful to him for the interest which he bestows on my public appearance and the preparation for it. Cramer is witty and entertaining and, like many who are gifted in that way, cuttingly satirical; he does not even spare his own infirmities, but jeers at his propensity for spirituous drinks, saying of a suspicious purple vein that winds around over his nose: 'C'est Bacchus qui m'a mis son pinceau; ce diable de Bacchus!' He speaks French from choice, having long lived in France; and in his character and manner he shows that he has spent a portion of his youth in that country." He had married his beautiful first wife in her earliest youth, but after her death he formed a second matrimonial tie, which remained a happy one into the evening of his life. For many years they lived together in an extremely modest style, on a very small pension paid him by the house of Cramer, Beale & Co. His celebrated name was a rich capital for their music business.

"As a warning," the journal goes on, "I will here mention, that Cramer is one of the most passionately addicted of snuff-takers. Good housewives declare that the floor has to be cleaned after every visit of the great master; while I as a pianist can never forgive him for disfiguring his aristocratic long and slender fingers, with their beautifully formed nails, by the use of the brown wood; indeed so immoderate is his use of it that it not seldom causes the keys to stick. Those slender, well formed fingers play legato admirably; they glide from one key to another with a binding continuity, avoiding octave and staccato passages wherever it is possible. Cramer sings on the piano so as almost to turn a Mozart Andante into a vocal movement; I must reprove the liberty he takes of weaving in his own often quite trivial embellishments."

Farther on we read: "His newly composed Sonata in D minor delights me greatly, and our bond of friendship knits itself more firmly through the honest praise which I bestow on him for it."

About Ries he writes: "I also have very happy musical hours with Ferdinand Ries; for I eagerly seized the opportunity to make the acquaintance of the man, whose C-sharp minor Concerto I had performed in public in Vienna."

One wished continually to hear the other, each taking delight in the other's earlier and newest works, and combining their forces in trying over four hand pieces. Their great reverence for Beethoven, whose pupil Ries was, must have drawn them to each other and formed a lasting bond of friendship between them. Ries at that time played no more in public; he devoted himself entirely to teaching and to composition. Both gave him gold and honor, so that already in the year 1824 he retired, a well-to-do man and a respected artist, upon an estate in the neighborhood of Bonn. There too he composed much, and his piano pieces, especially the Sonatas with violin, were great favorites both in Vienna and in other musical German cities. But in his orchestral works he was not more successful than Clementi. Symphonies by both of them were brought out in the London Philharmonic Concerts with no success at all; they vanished from the repertoire leaving no trace, nor could they establish a home for themselves in other countries.

Moscheles spent most of his leisure hours with Kalkbrenner, the harp-player Dixi, and the music-dealer Latour, a partner in the house of Chappell. "Dixi," he relates, "has a most charming house in Crabtree near London; a pleasant trip upon the Thames takes you there; and as the heavy city air torments me and causes me an ugly headache such as I never knew before, Dixi and his wife persuade me into frequent visits, placing a friendly sleeping chamber at my service." There too were Kalkbrenner and Latour domesticated as familiar guests, and there was music-making to their hearts' content. Dixi was a clever artist on his instrument; Latour a zealous piano teacher, as well as composer of little pieces, which were published by his own firm.

And Kalkbrenner! The world knows him as one of the most brilliant virtuosos of his times, and Moscheles also celebrates him as the 'Octave hero;' but he knew him already in Vienna as a light, honey-sweet man, little to be depended on, in social intercourse not disagreeable, unfit for friendship.

"We often play four-hands together, show each other our compositions and live as comrades in our art. I honor in him the Octave-hero, although I can only regard his way of playing octave passages with the loose wrist as injurious." In another place we read: "The Logier system (which sets two scholars to practising the same piece) receives some attention here, and I am glad, at Kalkbrenner's desire, who praises it very much, to have it practically expounded to me by the meritorious inventor and his skillful wife. Would I like to adopt it? I think not. The mind should practise more than the fingers; that's the main thing." At that time the greatest variety of magnates in Art thronged into London. There was Kiesewetter, the excellent violinist, the very great Mara and the still greater Catalani, besides Dragonetti, who for many years splendidly maintained the first place as Contrabassist. The latter was an original of the purest water. Moscheles relates of him: "In his saloon in Leicester Square he has a great assemblage of various puppets sitting, among them a female Moor. When a visitor comes in he tells this or that one of the ladies to make room for him so that he may come nearer; and of his nearer acquaintances he inquires whether his favorite puppets look better or worse since their last visit, and other nonsense of the sort. He takes a terrible deal of snuff out of a gigantic snuff box, and has also a gigantic collection of other boxes. The strangest thing about him, though, is his speech,—a regular gibberish, in which his native Bergamasco is mingled with bad French and still worse English."

In the first days of his stay there Moscheles went to His Majesty's Theatre (Haymarket) and was not a little astonished at the burthensome etiquette which requires one to appear in shoes and stockings, and of course in dress coat and white cravat. "It was well that, for the first time, I chanced to hear only the Turco in Italia, with its light and shallow music, for now I could give myself up with full delight to the superb singing of a Camporese, an Ambrogetti, and from my parterre seat feast my eyes on the brilliant company in the boxes. The circle of charmingly beautiful ladies in elegant toilet and splendid jewelry, under a light almost as clear as day, seemed like a dazzling wreath of sunbeams."

The English operas, which were given at Drury Lane, interested him very much; especially the singer Braham, whose wonderfully beautiful tenor had acquired a peculiar enamel through the cultivation given him by his friend Mme. Camporese. Most of the other singers he finds excellently schooled, only Miss Wilson, the prima donna, less attractive, and the visitors of the Drury Lane Theatre less elegant and fashionable than those of the Italian opera.

Descending the theatrical scale, he now visited the Surrey in the City and there saw a melodrama to set one's hair on end, finding it unedifying; but on a later evening, in a proper concert hall, the Argyll Rooms, he enjoyed the capital representation of a small French troop, supported by the nobility at its own expense, for its own enjoyment. Astley Theatre, the rival to Franconi's, was giving Gillias with great splendor and applause, and there also his friends took him. They also led him to Hyde Park, at the fashionable promenade hour. In his journal he remarks: "My admiration of the splendid horses and equipages, of the beauties indolently leaning back in their barouches and the bold Amazons on spirited horses, could not prevent me from recalling Byron's words:

"Those vegetable puncheons called Parks,
With neither fruit nor flower to satisfy
Even a bee's slight muschings."

"For any thing more bald, more destitute of tree or shrub than this Hyde Park, I never met." In later years he found an opportunity to feast himself on Parks adorned with flowers and infinitely beautified.

As of the things worth seeing in Paris, so too of London with its often described lights and shadows, its art collections, &c., the journal gives but passing notice; not even once does he dwell upon his acquaintance with the famous painters Géricault and Rochard. Music occupies him wholly, and he carefully notes down all his great and small experiences in this domain.

May 28. "Under Kiesewetter's direction, in the Philharmonic concert, they gave Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, worthily executed, only the thundering kettle drums with a disturbing effect; Aria from Titus by Miss Goodall; violin quartet by Mozart, played by Spagnoletti, Lindley; Terzet from Idome- neo, sung by Mme. Salmon, Miss Goodall, W. Begrez; Overture to Lodoiska. Second part: Symphony in D by Mozart; Air from Julius Maccabreus, charmingly sung by Mme. Salmon; Septet for harp and string instruments (Dragonetti bass, Bochsá harp); Aria sung by Begrez; Overture to Egmont. The ensemble pieces of this concert went with especial precision."

May 30. "Heard the distinguished flute-player Tulon in his own concert (Argyll Rooms). A medley of vocal pieces by Mmes. Goodall, Vestris, Camporese, Salmon, Sig. Ambrogetti and others. Mile. Buchwald, a very brave pupil of Kalkbrenner, played a Septet by him."

A Musical Supper Party.

BY THE LATE N. P. WILLIS.

It was one of those private concerts given at an enormous expense during the opera season, at which "assisted" Julia Gristi, Rubini, Lablache, Tamburini, and Ivanhoff. Gristi came in the carriage of a foreign lady of rank, who had dined with her, and she walked into the room like an empress. She was dressed in the plainest white, with her glossy hair put smooth from her brow, and a single white japonica dropped over one of her temples. The lady who brought her chaperoned her during the evening, as if she had been her daughter, and, under the excitement of her own table and the kindness of her friend, she sang with a rapture and a freshness of glory (if one may borrow a word from the Mississippi) which set all hearts on fire. She surpassed her most applauded hour on the stage; for it was worth her while.

The audience was composed almost exclusively of those who are not only cultivated judges, but who sometimes repay delight with a present of diamonds.

Lablache shook the house to its foundation in his turn; Rubini ran through his miraculous compass, with the ease, truth and melody for which his singing is unsurpassed; Tamburini poured his rich and even fullness on the ear; and Russian Ivanhoff, the one southern singing-bird who has come out of the north, wire-draw his fine and spiritual notes, till they who had been flushed and tearful, and silent when the others had sung, drowned his voice in the poorer applause of exclamation and surprise.

The concert was over by twelve, the gold and silver paper bills of the performance were turned into fans, and every one was waiting till supper should be announced—the prima-donna still sitting by her friend, but surrounded by the foreign attaches, and in the highest elation at her own success.

The doors of the inner suite of rooms were thrown open at last, and Gristi's cordon of admirers prepared to follow her in, and wait on her at supper.

At this moment one of the powdered menials of the house stepped up and informed her very respectfully that supper was prepared in a separate room for the singers.

Medea in her most tragic hour never stood so abominably the picture of hate as did Gristi for a single instant, in the centre of that aristocratic world. Her chest swelled and rose, her lips closed over her snowy teeth, and compressed till the blood left them; and, as for myself, I looked unconsciously to see where she would strike. I knew then that there was more than fancy—there was nature and capability of the real—in the imaginary passions she played so powerfully. A laugh of extreme amusement at the scene from the high born woman who had accompanied her suddenly turned her humor, and she stopped in the midst of a murmuring of Italian, in which I could distinguish only the terminations, and, with a sort of theatrical quickness of transition, joined heartily in her mirth.

It was immediately proposed by this lady, however, that herself and her particular circle should join the insulted prima-donna at the lower table; and they succeeded by this manoeuvre in retaining Rubini and the others, who were leaving the house in a most unequivocal Italian fury.

I had been fortunate enough to be included in the invitation, and with one or two foreign diplomatic men, I followed Gristi and her amused friend to a small room on a lower floor, that seemed to be the housekeeper's parlor.

Here supper was set for six (including the man who had played the piano,) and on the side-table stood every variety of wine and fruit; and there was nothing in the supper at least to make us regret the table we had left. With a most imperative gesture and rather an amusing attempt at English, Gristi ordered the servants out of the room, and looked the dog; and from that moment the conversation com-

My long residence in that country had made me at home in it; every one present spoke it fluently; and I had an opportunity I might never have again, of seeing with what abandonment these children of the sun throw aside rank and distinction (yet without forgetting it) and join with those who are their superiors in every circumstance of life, in the gayeties of a chance hour.

Out of their own country these singers would probably acknowledge no higher rank than that of the kind and gifted lady who was their guest; yet with the briefest apology, at finding the room too cold after the heat of the concert, they put on their hats as a safeguard to their lungs (more valuable to them than to others,) and as most of the cloaks were the worse for travel, and the hats opera-hats with two corners, the grotesque contrast with the diamonds of one lady and the radiant beauty of the other, may easily be imagined.

Singing should be hungry work, by the knife and fork they played, and between the excavations of truffle pies, and the humpers of champagne and burgundy, the words were few. Lablache appeared to be an established droll, and every syllable he found time to utter was received with the most unbounded laughter. Rubini could not recover from the slight he conceived put upon him and the profession by the separate table; and he continually reminded Gristi, who by this time had quite recovered her good humor, that the night before, supping at Devonshire House, the Duke of Wellington had held her gloves on one side, while his Grace, their host, attended to her on the other. "E vero!" said Ivanhoff, with a look of modest admiration at the prima-donna. "E vero, e bravo!" cried Tamburini, with his sepulchral talking tone, much deeper than his singing. "Si, si, bravo!" echoed all the company; and the haughty and happy actress nodded all round with radiant smile, and repeated, in her silver tones "Grazie, cari amici! grazie!"

As the servants had been turned out, the removal of the first course was managed in picnic fashion; and when the fruit and fresh bottles of wine were set upon the table by the attaches and younger gentlemen, the health of the princess who honored them by her presence was proposed in that language which, it seems to me, is more capable than all others of expressing affectionate and respectful devotion. All uncovered and stood up, and Gristi, with tears in her eyes, kissed the hand of her benefactress, and drank her health in silence. It is a polite and common accomplishment in Italy to improvise in verse, and the lady I speak of is well known among her immediate friends for a singular facility in this beautiful art. She reflected a moment or two, with the moisture in her eyes and then commenced, low and soft, a poem, of which it would be difficult—nay, impossible to convey—in English, an idea of the music and beauty. It took us back to Italy, to its heavenly climate, its glorious arts, its beauty and its ruins, and concluded with a line of which I remember the sentiment to have been, "Out of Italy every land is exile!" The glasses were raised as she ceased, and one repeated her, "Puori d'Italia tutto è esilio!" "Ma!" cried out the fat Lablache, holding up his glass of champagne, and looking through it with one eye, "siamo ben esiliati qua!" [but we are well exiled here,] and with a word of drollery the party recovered its gayer tone, and the humor and wit flowed on brilliantly as before.

The house had long been still, and the last carriage belonging to the company up stairs had rolled from the door, when Gristi suddenly remembered a bird that she had lately bought, of which she proceeded to give a description that probably penetrated to every corner of the silent mansion.

It was a mocking bird, that had been kept two years in the opera house, and between rehearsal and performance had learned parts of every thing it had overheard. It was the property of the woman who took care of the wardrobes.

Gristi had accidentally seen it, and immediately purchased it for two guineas. How much of embellishment there was in her imitations of her treasure, I do not know; but certainly the whole power of her wondrous voice, passion, and knowledge of music, seemed drunk up at once in the wild, various, difficult, and rapid mixture of the capricious melody she undertook. First came, without the passage which it usually terminates, the long, throat-down gurgling, water toned trill, in which Rubini (but for the bird and its mistress, it seemed to me,) would have been inimitable; then right upon it, as if it were the beginning of a bar, and in the most unbreathing continuity, followed a brilliant passage from the Barbier de Seville, run into the passionate prayer of Anna Bolina, in her madness, and followed by the air of "Suona la tromba intrepida," the tremendous duet in the Puritani between Tamburini and Lablache. Up to the sky, and down to the earth again—away with a note of the wildest gladness, and back upon a note of the most touching melancholy—If the bird but half equals the imitation of his mistress, he were worth the jewel in a sultan's turban. "Giulia!" "Giuiletta!" cried out one and another, as she ceased, expressing in their Italian diminutives the love and delight she had inspired by her incomparable execution.

The stillness of the house in the occasional pauses of conversation reminded the gay party at last that it was wearing late. The door was unlocked, and the half dozen sleepy foot-men hanging about the hall were despatched for the cloaks and carriages; the drowsy porter was roused from his deep leathern dormouse, and opened the door, and broad upon the street lay the cold gray light of a summer's morning.

The Waltz.—Lanner.—Strauss.

The waltz was first danced in Austria and Bohemia, but has to all intents and purposes, become a German dance. It is, therefore, but natural that Germany should produce the best waltz composers. Some assert that the waltz appeared at a time when all political aspiration seemed to be crushed out of Germany, and when the people, in consequence, gave themselves over to licentious pleasures, to the dance often in its worst forms, displaying a carelessness to public affairs, which was simply astonishing. Another writer says, that Europe danced to the waltz into the 19th century. Be this as it may, to this day the graceful waltz is an object of admiration to the German, and more especially the South German. Let me add that a good waltz dancer will be able to dance on a space no larger than a common dinner plate.

Waltzes in their first forms were small and slow. It was C. M. Von Weher who, in his celebrated "Invitation to the Dance," gave a new impulse to waltz composing. Schubert, Pixis, Pleyel, Czerny, Gyrowitz, &c., wrote many good waltzes, but in the estimation of the public all were surpassed, and the world was thrown into a sort of delirium, when Lanner (born 1801) brought out his famous compositions. The old waltz was yet clothed in a periwig, had short buckled pants, and moved with a stiffness characteristic of the last century.

Lanner, like a streak of lightning, illumined the musical dance world. He was successful as a composer and leader. It was he who gave the waltz its present form—an introduction with a succession of waltzes, coda or finale, a form from which even the Strauss did not depart. Lanner took a young man as violinist into his band, named Johann Strauss. He had learned the trade of book binding, but felt so passionate a love for music that he offered his services to Lanner, and was accepted. Strauss did not long remain in a subordinate position. He separated from Lanner, started an orchestra of his own, (its greatest number was 27 men) composed and published his waltzes, and proved to be a rival of Lanner, who would eventually overshadow him. Although Lanner's waltzes are by many musicians considered the best compositions, Strauss soon gained and retained the affections of the public. Vienna had then Rossini, with his seductive operas; she had Lanner and Strauss. Was it to be wondered at that she forgot that Beethoven lived within her walls? Vienna sought pleasure. Beethoven preached truth. He was not the only prophet who was neglected in his days.

In the history of music these two men, Lanner and Strauss, will occupy a niche alongside of each other. A Strauss waltz was considered the ae plus ultra, and not to dance when one of these charming compositions resounded, was considered almost a crime. Neither of these men attempted more than the composing of dances, and in this respect they deserve a place in the history of the art. Strauss composed some 250 pieces, and died in 1849, the great gates of St. Stephen's Church being opened for his funeral procession.

It was but natural that these two men should find imitators, and why not? The way was now paved. There was money to be made by composing, by ball-room and concert performances; there was a short road to public favor, and to a temporary reputation. And who has a right to take a Strauss to account? To him it was given to blow Oberon's horn. As Gollmick says, who would not do the same if he had the power? Would it pay Verdi to write Fidelio, when for his Aida alone he receives more money than Beethoven did for all his works? Strauss and Lanner became rich, while Beethoven and Mozart struggled against want. Is it a wonder that we have Gung'l, Labitzky, Lumbye, Farbach, Musard and others? They entered the arena in quick succession, and while they indulged in many Jubilee freaks on a small scale, they also won many laurels.

The mantle of Strauss and Lanner was, however, not yet to depart from the Strauss family. A third waltz king arose, a son of Strauss, and he it is who visited you during the Jubilee, and almost persuaded Puritanical Boston that there was something in a waltz.

This third waltz king was born in 1825. The spark of the musician showed itself early. When yet very young, he played in his father's orchestra, but soon left it, started one for himself, and thus perplexed the poor Viennese with the great question as to who was the greater, father or son. With that good nature, characteristic of the South German, they sustained both. At the time of his father's death, he united both orchestras, and thus became in more than one sense his father's successor. Strauss, as a composer, followed in the footsteps of his father, and has never thus far changed materially the form of the waltz. His compositions are flowing, full of melody and rich in startling effects of instrumentation, portraying, not unfrequently, that Austrian, that South-German sentimentality, bordering on sentimentalism.

As a leader, he is eccentric—he is simply a Strauss. It is said that his father conducted very much in the same manner. The words of Louis XIV., "Le Valse—c'est moi!" may well be applied to them. While no one would blame Strauss for his peculiar ways, it would seem more than ridiculous in any one to imitate him. It was said of the Strauss father that he could speedily change any beer saloon band into a respectable hall-room orchestra. When considering that there is so much more in the style of execution than in the difficulty of his music, this was no very great task for a man with as much personal magnetism as Strauss was possessed of.

While Strauss Jr., has earned more money, and received more attention from the nobility than was the lot of his father, the latter will by many be esteemed as the greater, and is sure to remain nearest to the hearts of the people. Strauss had two other sons who became musicians, but neither of them deserve a mention in this letter. Both Strausses were great travellers, and wherever they came, like a Caesar, they could write back: "We came, we played, we conquered."

That there is much tordyism to the nobility, especially in Strauss's son, one can easily learn from the title pages and dedications of his music. It must have been paid, or else it is not likely it would have been done.

Not only in the waltz, but in the polka and the quadrille, are the Strausses great, and if our Jubilee Strauss does not forget his mission, if he will keep his hands off the opera, if he will be satisfied, as his father was before him, with the reputation of a great composer of dance music, that word great will, in a certain sense, be applicable to him, while otherwise he may lose the brilliant reputation he has thus far achieved.—"*K. The Human Voice. — A New Theory.

The following paper was read by Mr. G. V. Lee during the meeting of the British Association at Brighton:—

The precise manner in which certain organs in the human frame perform their functions is matter of dispute amongst the great physiologists, and various theories are from time to time propounded. But of all portions of the human economy which have engaged the attention of the philosophical anatomist none have given rise to so many different doctrines and explanations as that which appertains to voice. The vocal organ has, in turn, been considered a wind instrument, a reed instrument, and a string instrument, and recently some physiologists have been pleased to consider it all three; more, perhaps, with the hope of being on the safe side, whichever explanation turn out correct, than from the discovery of any facts, or the deduction of any argument which could lead to so inclusive a theory. In the face, however, of eminent physiologists arriving at such conclusions, we should not be deterred from submitting every existing theory bearing on the subject we have in view: first, to a thorough and sound investigation according to the light of facts which we have ourselves observed; and, secondly, to the test of a practical application to the purposes of our art. The theory which regards the vocal organ as one of the purely wind instrument class is now for the first time advanced; and, in support of the theory, it is argued that the vocal instrument consists of two tubes following each other consecutively, but separated by the larynx. That the lower tube is in reality but a conducting pipe to bring wind from the lungs to the larynx, or sound box. That the sound is generated in the larynx only by wind passing through it from the lower tube. That therefore no sound is produced below the larynx. That whatever sound is produced must necessarily, from the direction of the wind, be driven into the portion of the tube above the larynx. That, as a consequence, and according to acoustic principles, this portion of the tube (the pharynx) must, by its shape and dimensions, modify sound, and that it does undergo great changes, by reason of the fact that the larynx rises into it and descends out of it, thereby lengthening and shortening it during the ascent or descent of a scale. That since we notice that this tube alters its dimensions during the production of notes of different pitch, and that at the same time the vocal ligaments undergo no appreciable change, in length or otherwise, save upon a change into a different registre, it must be to the alteration in this tube that pitch of voice is due, and not to any change in the vocal ligaments. That it must be to the alteration in the vocal ligaments that registre of voice is due, since they undergo a change during the progress of one registre to another—the pharynx remaining unaltered during the transition. That, since the action of the vocal ligaments, from want of homogeneity, cannot be that of strings, nor from the absence of the alternating, approximating, and separation peculiar to reeded tongues be that of reed instruments, the vocal organ must be compared to an instrument of some other class. That the action of the ligaments is similar to that of the human lips, since, viewed with the laryngoscope, during the emission of vocal sound, they are seen to form themselves around the aperture for the wind with thick and rounded edges, as are the lips during the production of notes on the flute.

1. The most favored theory in these countries, and that which is not only advanced, but according to which vocal art is taught, is the string instrument theory; and since to our thinking it is of all others the most objectionable, it will be well before proceeding further, to give the arguments for and against it, so that the reasons for its rejection may be the more readily perceived. In 1741, Ferrein, an early and eminent authority in the field of research, was so struck with what he conceived to be the analogy between the vibration of the vocal ligaments and that of strings, that he at once named the ligaments "vocal cords," and endeavored to account for voice in its entirety by an explanation of the action of these ligaments alone. From him the term vocal cords has been carried down to our own time, but the name is wrong; first, from the fact that the ligaments, being flat and rectangular, bear no resemblance whatever to cords; and, next, because the vocal instrument, not being a string instrument, the term vocal cords applied to it is calculated to mislead as to its true nature. Following out the idea of Ferrein, Professor Willis and others made experiments with pieces of leather and india-rubber, placed over the orifices of the pipes in connection with the bellows of an organ: the results are put forth to prove that voice is indebted not only for its origin, but for its pitch and range, to the lengthening or shortening of the vocal ligaments. To sustain this theory experiments were tried upon the larynx of the dead human subject. The vocal ligaments were stretched to a certain length, and made to vibrate with a current of air. They were then shortened to half that length and sounded, and it was found that the last sound was as near the octave of the first as was requisite for all legitimate purposes of experiment, and thus they thought it was distinctly proved how voice was regulated as to its pitch. Now, apart from the fact that experiments upon the dead subject can never be taken as conclusive evidence of any function in the human body, and that mechanical contrivances, however perfect, are but poor and insignificant imitations of anything in the human economy, it must be apparent that these experimenters were only laboring to prove, what is commonly known, that membranes, whether twisted into strings as for the violin, or drawn into rectangular stripes as in the vocal ligaments, or stretched equally in all directions as in the drum, are capable of giving out musical sounds if made to vibrate; and that the pitch of these sounds will vary according to the amount of longitudinal tension of the membrane; but, in applying this law to their experiments upon the dead human larynx, they seem to have forgotten that they were stretching and taking liberties generally with the unresisting vocal ligaments which they had no authority for supposing that nature did; and which there was every reason for believing that nature, from the construction of the parts, would find it impossible to do. Take, for example, the range of the human voice, and compare it with that of the most perfect of string instruments, the violin. The violin has four strings, each of which measures in length at least twelve times that of the so-called vocal cords; yet, if we take the normal range of sounds in the violin, namely, from G below the treble staff, to G above the fourth space in altissimo—three octaves—it only gives the same range as do the miniature cords of the vocal apparatus, and such as we find possessed by Miles. Patti, Ilma di Murka, and other first-rate soprano voices. The length of string necessary to produce a single tone on the violin will be found to exceed the entire length of the vocal ligaments.

2. Reed instrument theorists. A theory so barren of ascertained facts to sustain it, and so much at variance with logical deductions as that of the string instrument, could not long satisfy the active and eager minds of mankind, bent on inquiry and determined to seek out the truth, even at the risk of running counter to preconceived notions and ideas; consequently, a new school of theorists sprang up, headed by such magnificent names as those of Biot, Cagnard de la Tour, Müller, Magondie, Malgaigne, and others, who boldly entered upon opposition to the string theorists, and started a new series of inquiries as to the analogy between the human vocal apparatus and reed instruments. M. Savart observes, that the essential principle of reeds consists in the periodic opening and closing of the orifice through which the stream passes. Now, the same principle governs the action of all reed instruments, and if the vocal instrument be a reed instrument it must be subject to the laws of reed instruments, and the vocal ligaments must act after the manner of reeded tongues—that is, instead of giving out sounds by vibrating as strings, they must do so by alternately opening and closing. M. Savart found by experiment that air blown through the rima glottis produced sound, although its edges were from one-sixth to one-fourth of an inch asunder, and with the aid of the laryngoscope a few minutes' observation of these ligaments under action will serve similar results. It seems strange that throughout the various experiments which have been tried none of the authors have given serious consideration to that part of the vocal tube which is situated above the larynx, namely, the pharynx; for if we blow into a clarinet, flute, or other wind instrument, sound merely is generated by our blowing from the mouth; the modifications of sound take place outside of, or beyond the influence of, the mouth or generator. Why should not this be the case with the vocal organ? If we observe the larynx externally where it corresponds to the prominence known as "Adam's apple," we find that it can be elevated or depressed with ascending or descending series of sound, the result being lengthening or shortening of the pharyngeal tube; during these actions the vocal ligaments do not alter their position for the production of tones or semitones within the same register. The evidence of Czermack established this conclusion, for he observes—"There is no reason to believe that there is any important difference between the appearance when these ('low') notes are sounded, and when notes in the same register and higher in the scale are sounded, during which the inside of the larynx can be seen." That the ligaments do alter to the inappreciable extent necessary for the gradation of sound in the slur may be inferred from the inaction of the larynx and pharynx. The incalculably small changes which take place may be imagined by citing the opinion of Dodart, who, after the closest investigation calculated that the difference of one-54th part of a fibre of silk, or the 384th of a hair in the dimensions of the aperture, was sufficient to cause a distinct alteration in sound.

3. So far, voice and the causes which modify it have been treated; but it will be seen that the subject is one of wider extent and greater complexity than can be fairly stated in a paper necessarily so restricted. The different theories which have from time to time been advanced, serve rather to perplex than to guide those wishing for information on the subject; but if in the little which may be accomplished by these efforts there will be sufficient to stimulate society to a taste for such matters, plenty of skilled writers are to be found who may more worthily and satisfactorily carry out the good work. For the theory which claims the vocal instrument as a string instrument it has been advanced that it is an instrument fitted with cords which vibrate in a manner resembling the strings of an instrument. That it is supplied with an apparatus of muscles for the purpose of tightening or relaxing these cords, or of shortening or lengthening them. That it is upon this shortening or lengthening of the cords that voice depends for its pitch, and that in order to prove all this we need only destroy the vocal cords to destroy the voice altogether. Against the theory it is urged that the tones of the human voice are not those of a violin or other stringed instrument, and what are called vocal cords in reality bear no resemblance to cords, being rectangular in shape, and wanting in that homogeneity which is an essential condition in the vibration of cords. That it is not the tension or relaxation of these ligaments or cords which regulates pitch, since it is now proved by actual observation with the laryngoscope that they do not alter their position during the production of tones or semitones within any given register. That in order that these ligaments should fulfil the duties assigned them as string instruments, they would require a greater space for elongation than it is possible to conceive the larynx capable of affording. That their destruction—causing total loss of voice—is no proof whatever of their being part of a string instrument, since the destruction of the lips would be equally subversive of the power of producing notes from the flute. In support of the reed theory, it is said that the tubular arrangement in the vocal apparatus distinctly points it out as a pipe instrument; that the ligaments in the larynx are reeded tongues, which are acted upon by the current of air from the wind-pipe; that these vocal reeded tongues are so beautifully and peculiarly provided that they can be lengthened and shortened for the production of high or low notes. That since the pipe must be so proportionate as to suit the current of air to the reed, the contraction and extension noticeable in the trachea evidently carry out this object. Against these arguments it is alleged—that the tones of the voice, except in badly formed or uncultivated notes of the lowest register, bear no resemblance to the tones of reeded instruments. That the vocal ligaments do not approximate and separate, so as ultimately to close and open the passage for air during vibration, as would be essential to the action of reeded tongues. That the human voice is capable of giving utterance to infinitesimal gradations in the glide or slur between semi-notes, whereas no reeded instruments can produce smaller intervals than semi-tones.

4. Deductions.—That the system of teaching prevalent at present is founded on the string instrument theory is unfortunately too true, and consequently we have the order of nature upset for the production of sounds which could be perfectly produced by cultivating the natural action of the parts. The larynx, which should move upwards and downwards according to nature, is kept rigid and fixed, and that which should be the result of the shortening and lengthening of a tube without effort, is effected by the undue and unnatural stretching of ligaments meant to fulfil another purpose. It might be argued that this action of the ligaments—that is, the production of different tones by their tension, could not take place unless nature had fitted them for the duty, but it should be borne in mind that it is a law in the economy of the human body that certain organs and certain portions of organs can act vicariously. The skin, for instance, can take on nearly the whole duty of the kidneys; the liver and kidneys can, to a great extent, perform the functions of the skin. This is, however, only in cases of emergency; and, under such circumstances, the fact is taken advantage of by the medical practitioner, who, during the disturbance or disorder of any of these organs, forces their functions on to some other until the emergency shall have passed. This vicarious action could not be kept up for any considerable length of time without disordering the system; and so with the vocal organ. The duty of the pipe can to a great extent be thrown on the vocal ligaments, but only by a forced and unnatural action which, however successful for the time, cannot last; it must end in that bankruptcy of voice which, amongst professional singers, from their prominent position, is noticed, and which in private society takes place no less certainly to many who attribute the failure to some constitutional disturbance. To such persons singing is a labor that produces fatigue, uneasiness, and perhaps fatal disorder of the throat, and a dis-taste rather than a love of vocal art. Instruction on the reed instrument theory is open to the same objections, and to an additional one, that it is to the force with which a note is given that pitch and clearness of tone are attributed, and consequently effort is made the sine qua non in producing voice. Of course this, like the other system, brings its own punishment, for, in addition to the unnecessary fatigue and objectionable reed quality imparted to the tone, the force used upon the fragile mechanism of the larynx very quickly knocks up the instrument, and hence the ephemeral existence in public of some of our most promising vocalists, who, after a season of dazzling popularity, are compelled to sink quietly into the rank of second-rate concert singers, or what is far more lamentable, they become teachers of singing, and propagate their own bad systems in the society over which they preside. Viewing the vocal organ as a flute instrument, a very different result takes place; the voice is developed by encouraging the natural action of the instrument, as observable in the ascent and descent of the larynx. There is no effort used, and, as a consequence, there is no fatigue, there is no straining of parts, and therefore no string or reed quality sought for but the beautiful liquid and melodiously clear note of the flute. The author having subjected his system of vocal development to the test of practical experience, and having had ample opportunities of trying its merits, he may be permitted to state that his thorough conviction in the success of this method has been established for many years. Voices which had been overstrained have been restored to their natural conditions, and in cases of clergyman's diseased throat (induced by the use of sombre infections) the application of this system has always proved efficacious.

Prima-Donnas.

Of all the evidences which may be brought up from time to time of the luxury of present living, the prices paid to opera singers is probably the most convincing. The prima donna is the goddess of modern worship, and the hire of this divinity, or to use the technical language of operatic critics, this Diva, is a fair indication of the enthusiasm of her devotees. The sums which are paid to singers for appearing in an opera, or even for singing a couple of songs in a concert-room, or at an "At Home," have risen from figure to figure till they have at last almost ceased to excite astonishment. We know that one singer gets 120 guineas a night, another 160, and one, it is said, 200 guineas. Where is this to end—and what is there in the result to show an equivalent for such outlay? Lady Dedlock, in Mr. Dickens's novel, led fashion, and the manager of the Italian Opera led Lady Dedlock. Is there, indeed, truth in this satire, and are we to look to Fashion, and the influence of a few of her leaders, as the cause of this extravagance? That is, of course, are we to look at the influence of Fashion as being exerted in this case to an abnormal and unaccountable extent? Old stagers speak of the palmy days of the opera—the days of Lablache, Grisi, and Rubini; the days of the "Puritani" and the "Barber," the days that will never return to them, and that they say will never return at all. Certainly, then, in all the imperiousness of a fame that has lasted through two generations, Grisi never touched such salaries as second-class singers now expect and receive. It is not a year since a prima donna was paid 300 guineas for singing for one night. What is there comparable to this in the remuneration of men the most eminent in professions the most arduous? Does any surgeon, does any physician, does any counsel, who has sacrificed youth for eminence, and pleasure for distinction, go into the lottery of life to draw such prizes? Thirty thousand a year! What professional man can look over his banker's account, and find the income of professional earnings to approach such a figure? The operations of commerce do not properly enter into the competition. A merchant stakes not merely his labor and his judgment, but also his capital; and his splendid fortune must, therefore, be attributed to the double source. But as the barrister takes merely his knowledge and his argument, as the surgeon takes merely his knowledge and his manual dexterity, so the prima donna carries her capital about with her. The pretty face, the flexible voice, the rich organ, taste and dramatic ability, memory, health and fancy—such is the combination that, estimated in worldly securities, declares, as worldly securities now go—the largest dividend. It is somewhat humiliating to think that the answer to the question, what individual can produce most money by exertions independent of capital in a single year, should be a prima donna. Men are very proud of their achievements and of their independence, but they cannot do this, or even anything like it. And as we hear the figures, realize the sums to which they amount, and speculate over the speculations which they involve we feel indignant, and ask what they have done to deserve this wealth. There, indeed, is the gold, but where is the equivalent for it? The dominion of what are called "Queens of Song" is the great tyranny of the day, and a speculative fever seems to have fallen upon managers, destined to increase every year, and to rage with greater fury in the New World than in the Old. The triumphs of Mlle. Nilsson across the Atlantic—estimated in that simplest of all denominations, the pound sterling of lawful money of this country—were something extraordinary; but European capitals can also bear witness to the supremacy of the prima donna. The famous cantatrice of the Opera-house at Berlin, Mlle. Mallinger, the beloved pupil of Wagner, and the original representative of all his operas, closed her then current engagement with the management last May. As it would be impossible to keep the Berlin Opera-house open without Wagner's music, and as Mlle. Mallinger is the only prima donna that the German public will accept in these roles, it became necessary to make immediate arrangements for the renewal of the old engagement. It might seem at first sight that it was only a question of pounds, shillings, and pence, or, to speak more accurately, of guildens and Friedrichs; and that as the "drawing powers" of this singer must have been accurately known to the manager, the contract might have been almost settled by an accountant. But the stipulations which the singer asked for, and, it is said, insisted on, were not to be conceived upon such simple premises. She would have no engagement for a limited or extended period of time, but required that the contract should be for the rest of her natural life, providing, however, that she should be permitted leave of absence for three months in each year. After setting forth these more general conditions, questions of detail were gone into. She was to get 500 guildens for each representation, the fewest number of performances at this price being fixed at eight in every month. A pension of 5,000 guildens in reserve, and the trifling advance of 18,000 guildens to be paid immediately, completed the last of the more important terms of the contract. And yet even with such figures, and with conditions so onerous and peremptory before us, there is a great deal to be said on the other side. We can scarcely realize what a life is that of the prima donna, and how rare is each of the several qualities which must be combined to make a great singer. We think of the opera season of our city with its rehearsals, its triumphs, its novelties, and its revivals; but we scarcely realize that this season is but a part of the prima donna's annual programme—that Hamburg or Baden is to follow, and Paris and St. Petersburg, and perhaps the great deep to be crossed, and Verdi and Gounod to be sung under the American skies. How terrible must be the fatigue of such a life, and what a rare measure of health must the fortunate owner of other qualities possess in order to enable her to exercise them!—Globe (London).

Cramming.

Cram, cram, cram, is the general order of our modern schoolmasters; the favorite mode of warfare used by him in fighting against that new born enemy, the competitive examiner. It is the "sling and stone" with which he arms the strapping youths that they may go forth and successfully encounter that dreaded giant who now stands sentinel at Fortune's gate, and blocks all ingress to the roads that lead to genteel or professional occupation. The art of cramming is a crafty accomplishment, for by it the professor transforms and reduces his stern, proud judge—the competitive examiner—into his advertising agent; it turns his cursings into blessings. Occasionally it forms well nigh all that preparation—miscalled education—which the poor scholar receives to fit him for life's duties; and it too often leaves him as empty as it found him, with also the painful consciousness of being a sham. In no branch of education is cramming more used than in music, an art so generally taught in our girls' schools. In spite of its universality it is rarely considered a serious occupation, or one that demands a conscientious course of treatment. To be able to play the tune or piece is the goal; no inquiry is made how the master has enabled the pupil to reach it. The proud parent, whilst hearing the daughter of his heart sing or play "Home, sweet home," stops not to inquire whether she is parrot taught. He drinks in the melody, which he has paid for as an extra, and feels it a certainty that it is an item of expenditure in which he has not been cheated. What cares he whether she knows her scales—her alphabet in music—he is contented to leave such things as those for the study of poor music governesses; his child can sing and play, and nought is needed more. In ninety cases out of a hundred, however, that pretty singing and delicious playing are the results of cramming. The music master, either of his own choice, or in obedience to the principal, teaches tunes, not the art of music, starts from the end and not from the beginning.

If the young school girl has to cram for her holiday exhibition, how much more have singers to cram for their public performances? Why, in many instances they are only kept musically alive by periodical cramming. What is often a singer's history? At manhood he finds himself blessed with a fine voice, yet with absolutely no education in music, and ignorant even of its very rudiments. The precious, priceless gift of nature must be turned to immediate account; art education is expensive; he cannot afford to wait for years of training; to appear in public is a pressing necessity; he must live, although he may thereby devour the very seeds of future merit and success; so, before he knows even the alphabet of his art, he is "coached" in a few songs, with which, thanks to natural gifts, he makes himself famous. After once tasting popular applause he cannot make himself a child again. The drudgery of the elementary studies is too toilsome. At one leap he has bounded to the top of the ladder, and cannot descend to give himself the voluntary labor of again ascending painfully step by step. No, as he has done, so must he ever do: he must be crammed for every fresh effort; the singing master must ever drill him, and drive into his memory each new piece. Satire is ever ready with its gibes at the helplessness of such an individual: the cripple—especially if he be vain—is laughed at for his crutches: and many a singer is ridiculed and despised for his ignorance of an art that brings him fame and fortune. Yet there are fair apologies to be made for him. In his case, youth, the time for elementary studies, is past; poverty often forces immediate action; and, moreover, vocal training, under any circumstances, is not easily obtained in this country. With him, therefore, cramming is indispensable.

The instrumental performer is not altogether free from the charge of cramming. True it is that in our best orchestras the habit is impossible. Musicians under the batons of such conductors as Sir Michael Costa, Mr. Manns, and Mr. Cosins, are compelled to be masters of their particular craft. They have no time or opportunity for preparation, but must be ready at all seasons to do their work and their director's bidding. This faculty is the result of daily and hourly exercise. The exceptional facility possessed is not a gift or freak of nature, but the result of a special training that seldom has any equivalent in other branches of the art. The beneficial effects of daily application and performance may be observable also in those musicians who were educated as organists in cathedrals; the early, continuous, although monotonous work, has given them a certain mastery in their special department, so that like their orchestral brethren their efforts are more spontaneous and natural. Few, however, of our soloists convey to us impressions of being perfectly at ease. In listening to their performances we seldom can feel that they are engaged in an exercise which costs them no immediate labor. The painful grapple with difficulties are manifest; the forced labor, and the fearfully constrained attention, all denote that it is with them an unusual effort; like full-bodied bottles with small necks, the flow is not free: in a word, cramming has been used for the occasion.

Dare we say that composers are not exempt from this charge?—that the chief priests and scribes of the divine art, the authors of our operas, oratorios, Te-Deums, and symphonies, do not actually cram for their works? Can we insinuate that writing is not with them an every day exercise, or a constant, involuntary and natural expression of their musical thoughts? With every feeling of admiration and respect for those gifted beings, and with a sense of our own humbleness, we cannot but confess that their productions often give us the impression of fatigued labor. We do not refer to any occasional barrenness of ideas, which must happen at times with the greatest creators in art, but rather to those tacit admissions made by the author, of an unwonted gathering of forces, of an awkward use of implements that from want of familiarity give the worker difficulty and pain, so as to make us feel, as when with an anxious and nervous host, that the feast is an extraordinary occasion. And herein is the real difficulty. Writing first class works is not an every day business. In the life of an accomplished musician, an opportunity but seldom offers. Pecuniary rewards for such are never to be had, for the English are anything but munificent patrons of high musical art. The man of genius, too easily disgusted, turns aside to the drudgery of teaching, and extinguishes all aspiration for fame, and should he then be called upon for a work of the highest order, is it to be wondered at that he may fail? He has thrown by his implements in the lumber room, instead of keeping them bright and clean, ready for immediate use, on an emergency. He has forgotten that the goddess of music is a jealous goddess, claiming individual worship, and that to prostitute her he must turn his face from Mammon.—Land. Mus. World.

First Rubinstein Concert at Steinway's.

At the concert last night after the opening overture, well played by Mr. Bergmann's orchestra, the main business of the evening began with a long and rather abstruse concerto in D minor, composed and executed by Rubinstein. It is clear and spirited in character, and graceful and delicate in detached passages, but on the whole, so far as could be judged on a first hearing, not distinguished by a large melodic outline or richness of imagination. It is, however, bristling with technical difficulties, and might be judged to have been selected as an appropriate opportunity for bringing out at one stroke all the technical virtues of the great maestro. These were accordingly displayed to the best advantage, and recognized by the audience with almost frantic enthusiasm. Herr Rubinstein is clearly one of the phenomenal exponents of the age. Massive force, clearness of phrasing, the most wonderful clearness and definition in rapid passages, and the most resonant and vibrant elasticity of touch—all these, with a delicious silvery trickle of cadenza and a pianissimo as soft, yet distinct as the microscopic plume of a butterfly's wing, make his execution one of the marvels of modern artistic development. In the group of morceaux, which formed his second number on the programme, his performance of the Rondo in A minor, from Mozart, was delightfully quiet, tender and distinct in shading, and the following march from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," was given with an electric fire and vigor which fairly took the audience off their feet, though taken, for the sake of contrast, doubtless, with an exaggerated rapidity which suggests that the Athenian soldiery must have been used to drill at the extra double quick.

Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques," which formed the third Rubinstein number, are hardly marked enough in melodic form, hardly distinct enough in sentiment, for a general programme in a large hall, but were given with excellent force and clearness, and the pianist closed his share of the evening's work with a barcarole, molodje, and valse of his own composition.

Herr Wieniawski shared the honors of the evening by his execution of Mendelssohn's concerto for violin in E minor, and a Légende and Airs Russes of his own. His prominent characteristics as heard last night are a delightful firmness of execution, and the most penetrating clearness and fiery sweetness, so to speak, of tone. His work is thoroughly simple and honest, unmarred by affected sentiment or fantastic eccentricity. We miss in him somewhat of the tenderness which gives such a charm to the execution of some less distinguished violinists, but as a master of his instrument it is probable that Herr Wieniawski has not had his superior in this country.

Mme. Liebhart was heard in the familiar "Leiseleise," from "Der Freischütz," and in a pleasant ballad. Her voice is pure, strong, and clear rather than flexible, and her method marked by some of the less laudable peculiarities of the ultra-German school.

Mme. Ormeny did not do full justice to the "Non più mesta," from "Cenerentola," but we gladly postpone comment on the lady's performance till later hearing; as she was evidently suffering from the embarrassment of a first appearance before an audience, and in a country entirely unfamiliar.

The second concert will be given on Wednesday evening, when Herr Rubinstein will perform Beethoven's concerto in G major, and Schumann's "Carnival," and Herr Wieniawski will interpret a fantasia on Gounod, and a cluster of his own compositions.—Sun.

Patti and Mario.

(From the New York Tribune of Sept. 16.)

The opening of the musical season was celebrated at Steinway Hall last night by a much larger and more brilliant audience than one would have expected to find under ordinary circumstances so early in the year. All the seats were occupied and the lobby was crowded. Fashionable society was fairly represented, and a multitude of people from the world of art were there also—the barbaric face of Rubinstein and the portly figure of Wieniawski being conspicuous among them. It was indeed an occasion of more than common interest. The return of Mario was an event that had stirred the curiosity or enthusiasm of half the town. There were hundreds who remembered the sweet voice and noble delivery of seventeen years ago, and longed to welcome the great artist once more as an old friend. There were still more who knew the famous tenor only by the tradition of their elders, and were eager even to look upon the singer whose name illustrates one of the brightest chapters in musical history. He did not appear last night till the end of the first part, and then he merely took his share in the quintet from "Un Ballo in Maschera." E scherzod e follia. He was warmly received as he came upon the stage, yet not with any superfluous enthusiasm; people were busy, perhaps, trying to trace in that stately, well-preserved gentleman, with ruddy face and dark beard, the Fernando who won all hearts and charmed all eyes and ears so many seasons ago. Let us tell the truth as tenderly as we can; the art remains, of course,—the pure style, the elegant phrasing, the keen sensibility,—but that is nearly all. At moments here and there a faint flavor of the ancient tones carries us back in fancy across the wide chasm of years; we shut our eyes to the scene before us, and again the youthful Mario fills the stage with his presence, and the voice which had no rival rings sweet and pure through the chambers of memory. But it is, after all, a melancholy recollection. For those who cannot associate the ruin with its pristine glories, the exhibition must be terribly disappointing; for those who do recall the past, it is necessarily painful. Signor Mario sang little last night. His only solo, on the hills, was the Spirto gentil from "La Favorita," the romanza which he almost made immortal. Time was when he seemed to sing that right out of his heart, and when he drew tears with it out of the driest eyes. Now, losing in part the control of his voice, he has lost something of his power of expression; yet no one can see that the delicacy of his feeling is impaired, though his muscles may refuse to obey his will. He sings with extreme care, slipping over the high notes and dropping the highest altogether. His voice was a little too husky before he had finished; but he was recalled, and gave the pretty song which Hatton wrote for him, "Good-bye, sweetheart, good-bye." It was a sad thing to hear; yet how beautifully he used what resources time had left him, how much tenderness and elegance the old man threw into those familiar lines! We are glad to say that his welcome grew heartier and heartier as the evening wore away. He deserves the highest testimony of our respect; for he is one of the few really great singers of our generation, and it will be a pity if he do not carry away with him a substantial mark of the esteem in which Americans still hold him. Of Miss Carlotta Patti we do not know that we need say a great deal. She has come back just what she was when she went away. The "radical transformation in her style and manner," which Mr. Strakosch announced, is not perceptible to the average listener. We have the same astonishing tricks of vocalization, the same airy trifling with the mechanical difficulties of art, the same phenomenal purity and compass of voice, and the same lack of real sentiment which always characterized the singing of this extraordinary artist. She is not everything that a great singer must be; but in her own line she is unsurpassed, and her popularity is as great as ever. She rivalled Madame Peschka-Leutner in a part of the famous "Variations di Bravoura," by Proch, which the German prima donna sang so often in Boston and New York, and in the more florid variations Miss Patti showed decidedly the more facility of the two. She sang the Ardon gl' incensi and Spargi d' amare lagrime from "Lucia," and almost put the flute obligato out of countenance; and she amused the audience with one of her favorite ballads, "Within a mile of Edinboro' town." Miss Cary was also cordially received, and sang, as usual, very naturally and sweetly.

The Zapfenstreich.

The most impressive of all the festivities in celebration of the meeting of the three Cæsars was the Zapfenstreich, or Tattoo, in the Lustgarten. The time was night. In front of the Old Palace, an oblong parallelogram was marked out by temporary bouquets of gas, and inside it were gathered together twenty-two military bands, all belonging to the Guard Corps, the heroes of the morning, containing 775 musicians, together with 350 drummers and fifers. They should have been in their places by nine o'clock; but starting, as they did, from the Statue of Blücher in the Linden, and getting mixed up with and considerably delayed by the crowd, they did not commence their performances till fully half an hour later. How, it will be asked, is time to be marked, and are musical directions to be given, for such an orchestra, by night? The mere gas torches were not enough, as you may suppose. The difficulty was thus got over. A master conductor was perched aloft, on a high table, and he wielded a baton with a lantern in the head of it. Minor conductors, equally well placed in their different positions, took their cue from him and waved smaller batons similarly illuminated. It cannot be said that the thousand and odd performers were always together as perfectly as a Costa or a Manns would have wished; but the deviations from time were few and transitory, and only such as might have been expected. Precedence was to be given on every occasion to the Kaiser, and accordingly the first piece performed was the Austrian National Hymn. Its solemn and lofty character contrasted favorably with the Alexander March which followed in deference to the reigning Czar, and which is light, trivial, and commonplace. Perhaps it was well inserted between the Austrian Hymn and the famous march from "Tannhäuser," which was executed with great effect. The merry but admirable March of Radetzky was introduced between it and that fine piece of thoroughly religious music the Russian National Hymn, and was executed only by the cavalry bands. But how about the Zapfenstreich?

Surely very familiar airs, played by it matters not how many performers, do not constitute a "tattoo by torchlight!" They do not. Listen to that short shrill call of fifes and drums, that seems to break off almost as soon as it begins. The troops are being summoned to the bivouac fires. There is a pause. Then the cavalry trumpets rehearse pleasant music of a less barbaric character. Another pause, and then the drums and fifes again, with the sudden breaking off, or snap and relapse into silence once more. Comes next an Evening Prayer played by all the regimental bands present, not unlike other music in this world, save for its strange introduction. But it was splendidly given. It ceased. And was that to be all? There was absolute silence. Surely a drum was struck? No, but many drums were tapped. So softly, how softly! Thunder waxes louder too suddenly for any comparison here. The tapping grows to beating, the beating to rolling, the rolling to rending, with tremendous sound, your ears asunder. The great wave of din is at its height; then, like every other wave, it must descend from the summit it has ascended. From pianissimo to fortissimo, from crescendo to diminuendo, you hear all those drums. The twenty bars of which this terrible performance consists have more significance than mere melody could impart. They may be called a perfectly musical interpretation of the military spirit of Prussia. Monotonous and sharp, sober and withal inspiring, they translate the special characteristics of the service of this country into articulate, though, perhaps, not over artistic sound. When the twice repeated c c f with which the martial strain begins resounded in the vast arena, the public, who had listened to the softer pieces of the serenade in comparative silence at once broke out into cheers, and adopted an animated attitude more suited to the thunders of war than to the gentle inspiration of the Delphic god. The louder the drum beats, the shriller the fife rent the air, the more hoisterous grew the crowd, until the steady beat of the tambour was drowned by deafening hurrahs. Then silence once more, and a glorious burst of light instead. From the roof of the Palace five electric lights flooded the Lustgarten with night's sunshine, and at the same moment brilliant Bengal lights were thrown on the Museum opposite, 300 paces away, so brilliant that, standing at the windows of the Palace, one could not only make out, but actually study each separate figure in the celebrated frescoes executed by Cornelius from Schinkel's designs. Thus, in a blaze of glory, came the Zapfenstreich to an end.

Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. Tremont Temple, clean and bright with fresh paint and ornament, casting off its old gloomy aspect, and much more comfortable as to seating, was reopened on Tuesday evening, Sept. 24, with a concert on the part of the new "National College of Music," just established within the walls of the Temple, Mr. THOMAS RYAN, Director. A large audience were assembled, eager to enjoy the first music of the season, and curious to see and hear the new members of the Club, as well as the artists who are to preside over various departments of instruction in the school. —Why not School, as well as "Collego"? A rose by any other name, &c., and in these days the least pretension is the best distinction.—The programme, having for one object to introduce so many persons, could not of course have all the unity of a programme purely musical, and it was very long; and, as is the way with long, miscellaneous, personal programmes, sure to become still longer through encores. The consequence was that many went out before the concert was over, and some of the best things did not get their fair share of attention. These eager clamorers for the doubling of a song never seem to consider that they may be spoiling the effect of all that is to come after on the programme,—which in this case was as follows:

First Organ Sonata—Last movement.....Mendelssohn.
G. W. Sumner.
"The Two Grenadiers".....R. Schumann.
M. W. Whitney.
"Souvenir de Spa." Solo for Violoncello.....Serravallo.

Concerto for Three Pianos, in C.....J. S. Bach.
Messrs. Adams, Sumner and Tucker.

The Organ Sonata did not sound altogether clear. The Quintette limited itself mostly to accompaniment, Mr. Ryan and Mr. Heindl putting aside their violas for the clarinet and flute, making, with the reinforcement of a double bass, an orchestral abridgment. This accompaniment, good on the whole, was sometimes too prominent and not always in perfect accord with the singer. But it did seem good, and like the good old times, to hear for once a part of the old Beethoven Quintet for strings! Considering that the Club is newly organized, and that there has been no time for practice, for the assimilation of the new materials, the piece went smoothly, and the fitful alternation of Adagio and Presto was as vividly brought out as one could well expect in a hall of course too large for chamber music. The two new members (Mr. HENNING and Mr. HAMM), made an excellent impression by the artistic rendering of their solos; and we may congratulate ourselves on the acquisition of so admirable a violoncellist and so good a violinist to our Symphony orchestra as well as to the classical chamber concerts. Mr. LANG played Liszt's brilliant amplification of the Weber Polonaise in E, with the minor introduction from the one in E flat prefixed, wisely without accompaniment, since there was no orchestra, and played it with consummate skill and facile, finished grace, upon a "Chickering" which gave out the most musical quality of tone with remarkably clear and equal resonance and freedom. And Mr. Lang's triplet of pupils, Messrs. ADAMS, SUMNER and TUCKER, for whom was reserved the best task of the evening to the last,—pit that half the audience had already gone home, while those who waited were too weary to listen to a Bach Concerto with such attention as it has a right to claim!—acquitted themselves right nobly. Those who did wait for it were rewarded by the quickening spirit of such a healthy, hearty, perfect composition, reproduced so faithfully and so effectively. The only drawback was a little want of due subordination in the quartet string accompaniment at the beginning; but the heavenly Adagio (middle movement) was altogether most enjoyable.

Mr. WHITNEY, if hardly in his best voice, confirmed the impression he produced in Mr. Osgood's concert of improved quality of tone in the upper notes, greater solidity in his grand deep tones, and greater freedom, ease, artistic finish and vivacity in the delivery of his voice and rendering of his music. The "Two Grenadiers" was nobly sung. The other song, with two more for encores, one nautical, one serio comic, seemed child's play for a singer of his calibre. Miss EDITH ABELL, of whom we could recall no distinct impression, appeared for the first time since a period of three years' study in Europe. With a clear, pure, evenly developed soprano, neither very sweet nor very powerful, but agreeable, and with good phrasing and expression, she sang Mozart's "Dove sono,"—a little disturbed now and then by the imperfect union of a wind instrument,—which was received with considerable favor. For an encore she sang "Bonnie Dundee" to her own accompaniment. The greatest curiosity was felt to hear Signor CIRILLO, the new baritone from Naples, who comes so highly commended to fill the place of principal professor of Voice Culture in the "Collegio." Neither his selections nor the accidents of his condition (for he seemed to screen some natural embarrassment under a cool exterior), seemed to us quite favorable to a complete impression of his artistic powers. That his voice is round and sweet and even, thoroughly well trained, and that he phrases with intelligence, and sings altogether like a man who understands himself and his art, we believe every one was convinced; yet some untoward influence seemed to affect the truth of pitch. Doubtless he will do himself more justice.

MISS ANNA FINKENSTADT. A very pleasant matinée (semi-private) was that held at Chickering's rooms last week on Wednesday. The young lady, who is of a German family resident in Newport, R. I., and who has a decided talent for the piano-forte, has been studying for six years abroad, mostly at the excellent school in Stuttgart, and recently for some months with Liszt, who has shown much interest in her. A pretty large circle of musical people were invited to hear her here, after the good report of her concert performances in Newport, to whom, with the assistance of a cultivated singer, her relative, Mrs. LOUISE LUDWIG WERTH, from Alabama, she presented a choice programme:

Ballade, G minor.....Chopin.
Hear ye Israel.....Mendelssohn.
{ a. Rondo.....Hilfer.
{ b. Fantasia, Impromptu.....Chopin.
Song: "Mignon".....Liszt.
Rondeau Brillante.....Weber.
"Kilting".....Schubert.
Fantasia "Tausendkaiser".....Liszt.

The appearance of the young lady,—modest, unassuming, gentle, and poetic even,—bespoke sympathy at once. The room, close upon the noisy street, was very bad for sound. Nevertheless her rendering of all her pieces was very much enjoyed and elicited warm commendation. Her technique is excellent, brilliantly shown in the Rondo by Weber and the Fantasia by Liszt; and her interpretation of the Chopin Ballade and Impromptu showed a true sense and feeling of the music. All was clear and refined in style; and there was a musical, a genial spirit, something more than the ambitious mastery of difficulties, pervading it. Without having yet reached the level of the foremost lady pianists of the past three or four musical seasons, she gives indication of the gifts and of the earnest spirit which, when matured by further study, may rank her with the best. We are sure, all who heard her will watch her career with interest.

Mrs. Werth proved herself a refined and cultivated singer, and gave an appreciative rendering of her three selections. Liszt's setting of "Kennst du das Land?" might be called a study upon Mignon. For he has not treated it as a song, simply and briefly, or as addressed to any one, but rather a soliloquy, a reverie indefinitely prolonged. It is unique and interesting in some respects, but it leaves you (at least after a single hearing) not quite sure that you have heard the song of Mignon.

THE STRAKOSCH CONCERTS. The concerts of Saturday and Monday evening, and the Matinée of Wednesday have presented an uncommonly rich combination of artists,—even without MARIO himself, the great remembered and expected,—and programmes freighted with good things enough to pass for a fair tribute to the supposed musical taste and culture of our city. Here is the first:

Overture, "Oberon".....Weber.
Orchestra.
Violin solo, "8th Concerto".....Spohr.
M. Emilie Sauret. (with orch. accomp.)
Aria, "La Calanque," from "Il Barbiere di Siviglia".....Rossini.
Signor Ronconi.
Aria, "Caro nome," from "Rigoletto".....Verdi.
Mlle. Carlotta Patti.
Piano Solo, "Concerto in G minor".....Mendelssohn.
Mlle. Teresa Carreno. (with orch. accomp.)
Duet, "Si la stanchezza," from "Il Trovatore".....Verdi.
Mlle. Cary and Signor Mario.
Violin solo, "Fantasie" on Hungarian airs.....Ernst.
M. Emilie Sauret.
Aria, "Or la cull' onda," from "Il Giuramento".....Mercadante.
Mlle. Annie Louise Cary.
Romance, "M'appari," from "Martha".....Flotow.
Signor Mario.
Variations de Bravoura.....Proch.
Mlle. Carlotta Patti.
Piano Solo, "Grand Fantaisie" on themes from Goethe's "Faust".....Liszt.
Mlle. Teresa Carreno.
Quartet, "Chi mi frena," from "Lucia".....Donizetti.
Mlle. Patti, Sig. Mario, Sig. Ronconi and Parilli.

Mario! It is now almost eighteen years since the prince of tenors, then in the fulness of his power to charm, with Grisi, Badiali, and the rest, was singing to delighted crowds here, in I Puritani, in Lucrezia Borgia, in Il Barbiere (who of the few hundreds only present will ever forget that Saturday afternoon performance, when all the actors were inspired by the delicious music, and when we heard the exquisite grace and sweetness of the Almaviva melody for the first, perhaps the last time, wedded to an equal grace of action and impersonation!), in the Favorita, the Sonnambula, and Don Giovanni, and the Stabat Mater. Those treats began in January, 1855, and were over before March. Then, in voice as well as art, was Mario incomparable. Six years after that, in London, the sensitive voice appeared to us still fresher and the man more perfectly himself. But now! He is sixty-four years old, they say, though looking hardly fifty, well preserved and handsome. And they say that as a voice, a singer, he is but a wreck, a ruin. Well, is not Rome a ruin, and is not Rome poetic, fascinating? Doubtless in one sense it is a mistake for him to start upon a new career of concert singing, and count upon so late an after-summer. But we cannot agree with those who find it only painful to listen to his moderate and cautious efforts now, to his short flights of old familiar song. It is painful, to be sure, that he soon touches the limit of his power, that in a song like that from Martha, or in Beethoven's "Adelaide" he must only indicate or leave out altogether now and then the high and climax note which he is too conscientious to transpose; that the voice breaks sometimes, is so soon fatigued and often husky. But on the other hand, there is a marvellous sweetness left in many of his tones; whole passages at times, of rich, round, resonant and golden tone, enough, together with his still perfect phrasing, his inimitable method, his faultless, pure expression, and the charm of his whole manner, to bring back most vividly the singer of old times. The soul, the art, the ripe ideal indication of the song are there. Does he not still sing "Spirto gentil" (second concert), as no younger tenor can sing it? From first to last in tones all rich and full, and with a style, a chaste refinement of expression that must be the despair as well as quickening incentive of all younger aspirants? "Adelaide" (in the Matinée) was indeed a trying task for him; the voice was hoarser than usual, and several times he only looked the high tone upon which the stress should fall; and then would he smile, good-humoredly, as much as to say: "That is Time, the envious, the resistless! What can we do about it?" Nevertheless, any younger man, in full possession of a good tenor voice, with any brains and earnestness, who heard him do it, must have learned a priceless lesson in the rendering of that song.

In some smaller things, the little French chanson which he gave for an encore the first night, the Duets with Miss Cary; "Mira la blanca luna," by Rossini, and "Per valli, per boschi," by Blangini, and in the quartet, &c., he must have charmed even those who heard him for the first time. It is a privilege to hear so great an artist, while the art, the poetry survives, even after the organ has become "a ruin." There was a fitness in enlisting Sig. Ronconi in this troupe, for he was one of Mario's comrades in the great group of Covent Garden Opera. He was as droll as ever in "La Calzoncchia," and afterwards in Leporello's "Catalogue" song, and his voice was uncommonly round and firm. So we have used up our space in tribute to the Past, and must leave the Present and the Future to the future, with not a word now of the vocal virtuosity of CARLOTTA PATTI, the admirable, honest singing of Miss Cary, the brilliant pianism of TEXAS CARRARO, and the very decided mark made by the young violinist M. SAURET. We must come back to them next time.

Mario in New York.—The Rubinstein Concerts.

NEW YORK, SEPT. 30.—A large and attentive audience filled Steinway Hall on Monday evening, Sept. 16th. Every seat was taken both in the body of the house and in the galleries, while the lobbies were thronged with the critics, journalists and notabilities of the city. The occasion was the long looked for appearance of Mario and the Strakosch concert troupe. The programme was as follows:

- Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini.
Duet, from "L'Italiana in Algeri".....
Miss Cary and Signor Ronconi.
Piano Concerto in G minor.....Mendelssohn.
Mlle. Teresa Carreno.
Rondo, "Ardon gli incensi," from "Lucia".....Donizetti.
Mlle. Carlotta Patti.
Violin Solo, "Fantasia on Hungarian Airs".....Ernst.
With Flute Obligato.
Mons. Sauret.
Quintet, from "Un Ballo in Maschera": "E scherzo di 4 solisti".....Verdi.
Mlle. Carlotta Patti, Cary, Sig. Mario, Ronconi and M. G. Gottschalk.
Polka, "Pizzicato".....Strauss.
Aria, "La Calzoncchia," from "Il Barbiere".....Rossini.
Signor Ronconi.
Romance, "Spirto Gentil," from "La Favorita".....Donizetti.
Signor Mario.
Variations di Bravoura.....Proch.
Mlle. Carlotta Patti.
Romance, from "Mignon".....Thomas.
Miss Anna Louise Cary.

- Piano Solo, Grand Fantasia on Themes from Gounod's "Faust".....List.
Mlle. Teresa Carreno.
Quartet, from "Martha".....Flotow.
Mlle. Patti and Cary.
Signor Mario and Ronconi.
March.....Strauss.

Those who came to hear Mario had to wait patiently until the end of the first part, when he came upon the stage leading Carlotta Patti, and followed by the singers who were to take part with him in Verdi's Quintet. He was greeted with a round of applause, which was kindly but not enthusiastic, and then the audience listened in perfect silence; the young striving to catch every note of the voice that was once so famous: the old trying to recall the voice they once heard: both applauding at the close and both disappointed.

He sang with extreme care, managing the broken voice which remains to him as none but a great artist could do. But the voice is only a ruin and affected with a hoarseness which, one feels, will not pass away. In the second part he sang the great air from La Favorita, which has won him so many triumphs in Europe; but I liked him best in the ballad by Elton: "Good bye, Sweetheart," which he gave in response to an encore. This song was, I believe, written expressly for him, and the warmth, the tenderness, the delicacy with which it was rendered were in accordance with our preconceived ideas of the singer.

Carlotta Patti is unchanged and her feats in vocal gymnastics continue to be the delight of the general public and the wonder of all. She is the princess of eccentricities and can do absolutely anything with her voice—except sing. Auber's "Eclair du rire," one of her encore pieces, requires precisely her voice and nature; her rendering of it is perfect. The same remark applies to the "Variations" by Proch, but her rendering of the song "Within a mile of Edinboro," another encore piece, was utterly parrot-like and devoid of even the little sentiment which belongs to that threadbare ballad.

You doubtless remember "La Terza," the child pianist, who charmed us all nine years ago, and whose talent (so say the handbills) "Even Boston and Dwight delighted to praise." During her long sojourn in Europe she has played everywhere, pleased everyone, and now comes back to us, a child no longer, but a graceful, beautiful woman. The artist, too, has developed, apparently; before, it would have been a fantasia by Gottschalk or Thalberg which awakened our praise; now she greets us with Mendelssohn's great Concerto in G minor for piano and orchestra. There is perhaps only one woman who can play this Concerto exactly as it should be played, and the remembrance of its wonderful beauty as it took shape and grew under the fingers of Clara Schumann, came to my mind with the thought that perhaps our fair pianist might have made a wiser selection for her first appearance in her new character. But she played with more taste and feeling than I expected, and, though not with quite that fine, delicate shading which indicates a perfect acquaintance with the composer, yet in a manner which elicited an encore from the audience, and expressions of satisfaction from the critic. The Faust Fantasia brought another encore, to which she responded with a waltz by Chopin, (D flat), played, I thought, somewhat hurriedly, and with a carelessness of which that composer's works do not well admit.

The bold, free style, skillful bowing and pure intonation of M. Sauret, the violinist, took us by surprise, for although we should look for these qualities in the pupil of Viennetemps, we were unprepared for so much excellence. His execution reminds one of the stories told of Paganini, and his polyphonic playing is something like Ole Bull without any of Ole Bull's scrupulousness. Feeling and expression are manifested in his playing to a high degree, and his popularity is assured by his first performance here.

Miss Cary sang as well as usual, and Sig. Ronconi and Gottschalk were both good. The Orchestra was fair, and altogether the concert troupe is an excellent one. They gave four concerts and one matinée previous to their departure for Boston.

The Thomas Garden Concerts closed for the season on Sunday Evening, Sept. 29th, when a large and enthusiastic audience listened to a well selected programme, at the end of which Mr. Thomas was called out and greeted with a round of hearty and well deserved applause. On Tuesday evening, 17th, he gave a "Grand Wagner Night" with the following programme:

- PART I.—Kaiser-Marsch; Vorspiel to "Lohengrin"; "Eine Faust Overture."
PART II.—Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg"; Vorspiel and Schlußszenen from "Tristan und Isolde"; "Ritt der Walküren" (first time).
PART III.—Overture to "Tannhäuser"; Ballet from "Eisenstein" (first time); Huldigungs-Marsch.

The Concert Hall was crowded, and the rapt attention with which people listened to the music proved that the great high price of a new school has a large number of devoted adherents in New York. The excellent manner in which this difficult music was interpreted by the orchestra deserves the highest praise. The remarkable "Ritt der Walküren" awakened a perfect furor in the audience, which could only be allayed by a repetition of the piece. "Eine Faust Overture," however, was evidently too much for the listeners. There is undoubtedly somebody living who understands that overture, but he was evidently not among the auditors that night. Probably he was detained at home.

Every one will remember those admirable "Symphony Solos" with which Mr. Thomas favored us in the years gone by; and every one will rejoice to hear that they are to be resumed during the season of 1872-73. In response to a request, signed by a number of our leading citizens, Mr. Thomas announces six "Symphony Concerts," to take place at Steinway Hall on the following dates: Nov. 9, Dec. 28, Jan. 11, Feb. 1, March 29, April 26. In announcing these concerts Mr. Thomas states that "while the general tendency of the programmes will be the same as in former years, his special aim will be to restrict them to works of the highest eminence, both of the old masters and those of the present day. Owing to the efficient state of the Orchestra, he will be better able than ever before to illustrate the progress of musical art. Important novelties will be given during the season, which will be announced later."

The most interesting event which I have to record is the appearance of ANTON RUBINSTEIN, who has given three concerts and one matinée at Steinway Hall, under the management of Mr. Grau. These concerts took place Sept. 23, 25th and 27th, with a matinée Sept. 28th, and are to be continued on Oct. 1st, 3d, and 4th. Rubinstein has two great claims to eminence. He is a composer of acknowledged genius and originality, at a time when creative talent in music is in danger of becoming a thing of the past; and he is, moreover, one of the few great piano-forte players now living. Last, who is said to be his only rival, I have never heard, and therefore cannot compare the two artists. As a composer Wagner is his only rival.

In appearance Rubinstein is said to resemble Beethoven, and there certainly is something in the rugged earnestness of his face and manner which reminds one of the portrait of his great predecessor. As he approaches the piano he is heartily applauded and, in acknowledgment, he makes a low bow, half to the audience and half to the name plate of the piano. Then, with a quick wave of the hand he brushes back the hair which has fallen in thick, unkempt locks over his eyes, and seats himself at the piano. These little details of personal appearance you must notice before he begins to play, for, if you are musical, you will not perceive them afterwards. The piece is his own Concerto in D minor, a composition which he generally selects in introducing himself to a strange audience, and which, if I mistake not, was performed by Miss Krebe at one of our Philharmonics last winter. As he plays, his face—always grave—becomes as impassible as the sphinx, and his far-reaching eye seems set upon some bright objective point, the culmination of a grand succession of chords which unrolls beneath his fingers. He is conscious of no hearers save the unseen, and to him the present moment, life itself, is but one link in the mighty chain of art.

The orchestra however, of the earth, earthy, and sundry nois and signals passing from the pianist to the conductor seem to tone down the too blatant brass, and send a new life thrilling through the violins. The admiration we feel for the player is not such as we bestow, but such as he compels. And when, at the end of the Concerto, he faces a tempest of plaudits and bravos with an unmoved countenance, and declines, with a deprecative wave of the hand, the flowers that are offered to him, we feel for the first time, how extremely commonplace such demonstrations are. Rubinstein's versatility is amazing. In the four concerts given last week he played, always without notes, the following compositions:

- Concerto in D minor: Barcarole, G major; Nocturne, F major; Valse Caprice; Romance Barcarole, F minor; Rondo, G major; Suite: Bravoura, G minor; Variations: Sonata (piano and violin), RUBINSTEIN.—Air and Variations, D minor. Handel: Rondo in A minor, Mozart; March from "Rite of Athens," Beethoven; Etude 8 symphonique, Schumann; Concerto in G major, (with Cadenza by A. Rubinstein); Beethoven; Gita in G-dia, Rossini; "Auf dem Wasser zu singen," El Kélik; Schubert, arranged by Liszt; Chopin, Schumann; Concerto in A minor, Schumann; Sonata, C major, Beethoven; Nocturne, C minor, Chopin; Polonaise, A flat, Chopin; Sonata, F minor, Beethoven; Nocturne, E flat, Field.

If I might presume to criticize his playing in the least, I should say that the Beethoven Concerto, under his hands, was a little too strongly tintured with the player's own individuality; but to hear him play one of Schumann's pieces is true food for memory.

Henri Wieniawski is an artist of considerable fame and no little merit. His playing has created a decided sensation, and there is no end to the number of newspaper paragraphs written in his praise. But it is injudicious to compare him with Viennetemps, or to say that Joachim is his rival. No violinist, now-a-days, can be "good" but he must be "the best."

Mlle. Liebhart is a ballad singer of some note in England, and in her cool self-possession contrasts favorably with Mlle. Orment, who is subject to frequent attacks of "nerves" when upon the stage.

A Sun reporter has "interviewed" Rubinstein, and makes him give vent to a great deal of nonsense on the subject of music in general; but the whole report is to be taken with a grain of salt. A. A. O.

Worcester Festival.

(From the London Orchestra, Sept. 18.)

The 149th Festival of the Three Choirs has been celebrated this week and is going on as we write. In its features it differs little from its predecessors. No new work is brought forward to tempt approval and challenge judgment. Nothing more uncommon than Bach's Matthäus Passion in the way of sacred music, and nothing newer than Mozart's "Idomeneo" at the secular concerts, is contained in this year's programme. It is much however for Worcester to congratulate herself upon that her Festival is still unimpaired—that the gale of opposition has withheld without even a murmur this year from Lord Dudley.

Those, too, who had not seen Worcester Cathedral since the Festival of 1869, have found much to occupy their attention in the progress of the restorations that have been steadily proceeding during the interval. Although these are greatly advanced, there is still somewhat remaining for completion; the chief unfinished portion being the new pavement now being laid down in the choir. Enough, however, has been here done to afford a good notion of the beautiful combination of encaustic tiles with marble. The ancient stalls and misericordes, with their carving, have been restored; and among other improvements will be the restoration of King John's tomb and Prince Arthur's shrine—these two latter to be undertaken by the Government. The exterior, cloisters, Lady Chapel, and nave are finished. When all is done, when the elaborate marble pavement is laid, the graceful ironwork screens are in their places, and the barriers are removed so that the eye can range from the western door down a vista of clustered columns for 400 feet, till it rests upon the tinted marble of the roareds and the gorgeous hues of the eastern window, Worcester may boast an example of religious architecture wellnigh unique. Another feature that is new since the last music meeting is the fine peal of bells placed in the tower. The accomplishment of this work is mainly due to the Rev. Richard Catley, minor canon, who has found ready co-operation in many cases from members of different religious persuasions; only a comparatively small balance still remaining to defray the cost incurred. The arrangements made for the Festival within the Cathedral resembled those of previous years in every respect: an orchestra being erected at the western end of the nave, and an organ, specially built by Messrs. Nicholson and Co., being placed in one of the aisles. Mr. Done, the organist, has undertaken the direction, as usual, and Dr. Wesley and Mr. Townshend Smith have taken up subsidiary positions, according to the etiquette of the Three Choirs.

The first general rehearsal took place on Monday morning in the Cathedral, where the executants—chorus, orchestra, and most of the principal singers—assembled at half past ten, soon after which time Bach's Passion-Music was commenced, and this was followed by other portions of the sacred music selected for the morning performances. A medical certificate was received by the stewards stating that a severe illness would prevent Mr. Sims Reeves from fulfilling his engagement. So far as the morning performances are concerned, this did not necessitate any hiatus in the tenor solo music—Mr. Vernon Rigby and Mr. Edward Lloyd being secured; and efforts were being made to ensure the presence of Madame Trebelli Bettini at two of the evening concerts. With this disposition to make the best of a disappointment, and with the town full and bustling, the hotels crammed, private lodgings at a premium, and the demand for tickets very lively, the cheery old cathedral city entered upon the music meeting of Seventy-two.

On Tuesday morning at half past eight the Festival opened with a special service and sermon.

A little after noon the audience were assembled to hear "Eljak," sung by Mdlle. Titiens, Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Alice Fairman, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. Details are superfluous of so readily imagined a performance. Orchestra and chorus were efficient; Mr. Done conducted as usual; Miss Fairman exhibited very promising ability, especially in the air "Woe unto them," and of the well known artists the mention of their names suffices. The new peal of bells rang out a delighted audience, that by this time had got over the absence of Mr. Sims Reeves, whose share was divided between Messrs. Rigby and Lloyd. At night rain came on sufficient to mar the gathering at the College Hall, where a Mozart selection occupied the first part of the programme. The overture to "Idomeneo" was the first item, a noble work worthily played by Mr. Done's orchestra. Following it were the recitative and aria "Padre! Germano! addio" (Mdme. Sherrington); the chorus "Godium la pace;" the recitative and aria "Zeffiretti" (Mdlle. Titiens); the aria "Vedrommi intorno" (Mr. Rigby); and the chorus with solo (Mdlle. Titiens), "Placido é il mar." Next came "L'Addio" for which Mdme. Patey obtained a recall; the air, "Dalla sua pace," from "Don Giovanni," by Mr. Rigby; that from "Figaro," "Deh vieni," by Mdme. Sherrington; and the ever popular symphony in G minor, which was listened to with great attention. Mr. Done considerably omitting the repeats out of regard for his auditors' patience. The second part was miscellaneous, including the overture to "Masaniello" (encored), Bishop's "Firm as an oak," capitolly sung by Mr. Lewis Thomas, and Bevilgnani's "La Vezzosa," which in the hands of Mdlle. Titiens went most successfully.

The Cathedral was well attended on Wednesday, if not quite so well as the day before. The performance included a selection from Handel's "Samson," Hummel's Mass in E flat (No. 2) entire, and the first and second parts of Haydn's "Creation." The precedence of Handel caused the lesser lights to pale. Not that "Samson," despite its composer's higher opinion of it, can ever hope to rival the "Messiah" in popularity; it contains however the impress of the giant's genius—a genius which dwarfs comparisons. The choruses given in Wednesday morning's selection were, "Awake the trumpets," "Then shall they know," "To dust," "Fixed in his everlasting seat," "Weep, Israel, weep," "Glorious hero," and "Let their celestial concerts." Of these the execution was unequal; but "Weep, Israel," and "Let their celestial concerts" were finely rendered and attained a great effect. The solos were admirably taken by Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley. Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington's singing of "Let the bright seraphim," with Mr. Harper's accompaniment, was one of the great points of the performance. The pathetic air "Total Eclipse" and the stirring song "Honor and arms" (the latter sung by Mr. Santley) were in selection, which also included the overture and the "Dead March" in D. Hummel's Mass followed the oratorio in solemn and pompous procession. To Hummel's claim as a church composer we have elsewhere referred: remains it to say that the solo parts were sung by Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Alice Fairman, Mr. Vernon Rigby, and Mr. Santley, in generally irreproachable style, and that the picturesque orchestral accompaniment was well sustained. At half past two commenced the second part of the programme, constituted by Haydn's "Creation." The introductory prelude (the representation of Chaos) was admirably rendered, and the burst of sound descriptive of the creation of light resounded throughout the sacred edifice with remarkable intensity. The solos were taken by singers who are frequently associated in this work. Mlle. Titiens sang the solo in the chorus "The marvellous work," the airs "With verdure clad" and "On mighty pens;" Mr. E. Lloyd sang the tenor solos, "Now vanish," "In splendor bright," and "In native worth"—the latter with special success; Mr. Lewis Thomas gave the air "Rolling in flaming billows," and the scena "Now heaven in fullest glory" (with preliminary recitative) with much power, the trios having been effectively rendered by the singers just named. The choruses were generally well sung, particularly that grand climax to the first part, "The heavens are telling." The audience numbered 1767 persons, and the amount collected for the charity was £124—a result so far very satisfactory.

The Wednesday evening concert had for its features a long selection from "L'Allegro ed il Penseroso" of Handel, a symphony of Haydn, and the "Cornelius" March of Mendelssohn. It is a pity that the whole work of Handel could not be done, as to many of the audience the music was absolutely new, and very few opportunities or ear of hearing it well done. A disappointment awaited the audience; Mdlle. Titiens broke down and had to be apologized for. Mdme. Sherrington however stepped into the breach with extraordinary readiness and success, and carried all before her, singing both her own and colleague's share, and netting great praise for the song "Sweet bird," and the air "Hide me from day's garish eye." This lady's conception and rendering of Handel are simply perfect. Mr. Rigby was allotted the tenor music, and the bass was divided between Mr. Lewis Thomas and Mr. Santley, the former having the ad captandum air "Haste thee, nymph," the latter "Mirth admits me," and the opening of "Populous cities." The choruses were well given. The symphony of Haydn's was the "Surprise"—well played and decidedly gratifying to the audience. The overture to "Alexander's Feast" introduced L'Allegro. A number of miscellaneous pieces made up the rest of the programme, which concluded with the "Cornelius" March mentioned above.

The performance of Bach's Passion music yesterday morning was exceedingly satisfactory. The solos were given by Mdme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mdme. Patey, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley. The work had been well rehearsed, and Mr. Done was judiciously sparing in his introduction of additional accompaniments. We have on recent occasions treated at length of this magnificent work: so that we need do no more than chronicle its conscientious rendering, and the fact that at every hearing its sublime beauty is more and more apparent. Special praise is due to the chorus generally, and notably for their execution of the Chorales, which received the most reverent attention from the audience. In our concluding notice of the Festival, next week, we shall refer to the evening concert, when the "Ruins of Athens" was the chief piece, the Chorus of Dervishes creating an immense sensation. The returns for yesterday were 2071 entrants subscription £123.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Do not wound the Heart that loves thee. 4. D to c. Benedict. 40
"If thy blessing will give pleasure—" A good wholesome song, written by Dexter Smith, and furnished with a very varied melody and accompaniment by the distinguished English composer.
- Always look up. 2. F to f. Wellman. 30
"Don't take it to heart, but try again, And always look up, don't look down." Good advice very agreeably given.
- Domenica. A collection of Sacred Pieces. L. H. Southard.
Mr. Southard's name is a guarantee of the classic excellence of the six pieces with the above general title, of which
- No. 2. As the Hart pants. 4. Ab. 40 will be warmly welcomed by Quartet singers.
- Oh, Willie Boy, come home. 3. Eb to c. Gabriel. 50
"The white-winged ship went sailing Across the sunny sea." A mother's song, and will please those whose boys were "far at sea."
- Golden Days. 3. D to f. Sullivan. 30
"Once in the days of golden weather, Days that were always fair." A very sweet poem, with appropriate music.
- Separation. 4. Bb to f. Kingley. 35
"Forget not love, when I am absent, All the songs I sang to thee." Evidently meant for the concert-room, in which, skillfully rendered, it ought to be a success.
- Mother says I mustn't. 2. D to c. Hunt. 35
"When I asked a parting kiss She always used to say, 'Mother says I mustn't, O George, please George—'" Capital. It is refreshing to meet something so very funny and musical, yet not at all coarse.
- I too had found a Heart. (Le Leva Militaire). 4. C to g. Vannini. 30
A lively, piquant Italian air, that pretends to be sad, but is not so at all.
- The Happy Old Times. 3. F to g. Geary. 30
"Then come again, ye merry times Sweet, sunny, fresh and calm." A song of rare freshness and beauty—and no mistake.
- Te Deum Landamus in F. 4. Stuartwood. 75
Another Te Deum, of which we need a great many, and this is a good one.
- Near a Fountain's flowery base, or Dreams. 3. F to f. Rudall. 30
"Near a fountain's flowery base, A blue eyed page was singing." A very sweet song.
- Somebody. 3. D to g. Tull. 30
"There's Somebody tenderly loves you, See who can this Somebody be?" The title has been used before, but this song is new, and the ideas very neatly expressed. Lively music.
- At yon distant Hills I gazed. 4. Bb to b. Abb. 30
"At yon distant hills which tower aloft," "Ich habe nach jenen Bergen geseht." One of Abb's songs. One can hardly say more, as all are so good. The high b named can be avoided by the substitution of a lower letter.
- When Summer days are flying. 3. F to f. Aspa. 30
A song for Autumn, mellow and musical, and a little sad.

Instrumental.

- Henry Wilson's Grand March. With Portrait. 3. C. Jervis. 40
It is not such a great thing to be up for Vice-President, but to have such a splendid march composed in your honor, and with your face enduringly printed on the title,—that is fame!
- Mathilde. Valse Brillante. 3. Eb. Chassaignac. 40
A fine waltz, either for the pleasure of the dancer or the player.
- Golden Bells. 4 hands. 5. E. S. Smith. 1.25
A great deal of music has been rung from these Golden Chimes within a year or two. The Bells are popular, and the 4 hand arrangement will add new power and beauty.
- The Sweet Violet. 1. G. Smallwood. 25
The Cowslip. 1. C. "Of the set called 'Flowers of May.' Teachers of beginners should order the whole 12. You will find no better 'first pieces.'"
- Abt's beautiful Songs: I think of thee. 3. Bb. Pratt. 25
Far o'er the Stars their rest. 3. F. "25 Mr. Pratt shows a fine taste and skill in arranging these beautiful songs (into 'Songs without words') for Piano. Those who cannot sing can play them, and those who can sing the originals, will receive new pleasure from the novel form of the melodies.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

The Love of God.

Oh, love of God!

Thou love so far transcending

Each trembling hope,

All poor desert of mine;

And the sweet light

Of thy fair presence lending,

Softly transfiguring

Things the least divine.

As some dark pool,

Deep fringed with bending rushes,

Lies black and sullen

'Neath the starless night;

When from the east

The radiant dawn upgushes,

Shines with a glory

Of reflected light:

So my dark soul,

Deep locked within the prison

Of its own sorrow,

Black and cheerless lay;

Till on its night

God's radiant morn uprises,

Golden and glorious

Shines thy perfect day.

—Mrs. Richard Greenough.

(From the Atlantic Monthly for November.)

Mozart.

Most beautiful among the helpers thou!

All heaven's fresh air and sunshine at thy voice

Flood with refreshment many a weary brow,

And sad souls thrill with courage and rejoice

To hear God's gospel of pure gladness sound

So sure and clear in this bewildered world,

Till the sick vapors that our sense confound

By cheerful winds are into nothing whirled.

O matchless melody! O perfect art!

O lovely, lofty voice that rings so true!

O strong and radiant angel, every heart

Bows down before, with reverence ever new!

Loved shalt thou be, while time may yet endure,

Spirit of health, sweet, sound, and wise and pure!

Music in New York.—Italian Opera.—Rubinstein.

NEW YORK, Oct. 14.—The long anticipated debut of PAULINE LUCCA took place at the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, Sept. 30, and the house was well filled by an audience which seemed determined to give the new prima donna a welcome that should cause her to forget that she is in a strange land. The Opera was L'Africaine, a work with which she is supposed to be identified to an extent which, considering its sombre character and her unfitness for the role of Selika, is certainly extraordinary. If the management and sundry paragraphs are to be credited, she is the only Selika, and Meyerbeer would have no other; but I think any impartial critic would say that Mme. Marie Sass, of the Grand Opera in Paris, has achieved an artistic success in that role which Mme. Lucca did not approach on Monday evening, and to which she cannot attain. But her disqualifications, be it understood, are natural and do not arise from any light sense of the requirements of the situation. The music she sang earnestly and with classical simplicity. Her voice is an excellent mezzo-soprano, broad, powerful and sympathetic, beautiful in the middle range, but a little disappointing in some of the high notes. The impression left by her appearance in L'Africaine was that of a really great singer, but one whose genius seemed better fitted for a Zerlina or a Cherubino than for Meyerbeer's passionate and gloomy heroine. The cast was distributed as follows: Selika, Mme. Pauline Lucca; Inez, Mme. Leoni Levielle; Anna, Miss Shofield; Vasco di Gama, Signor Abrugnedo; Don Alvar, Signor Lyall; Nelusko, Signor Moriami; Don Pedro, Sig. Jamet; Grand Inquisitor, Sig. Bertacchi; Don Diego, Sig. Locatelli; Priest, Sig. Forsatti. The names of Messrs. Jamet and Lyall are already well known to us as associated with some excellent impersonations last winter in Faust and Mignon. Of the others, the tenor, Signor Abrugnedo, made a favorable impression, and is evidently a conscientious artist. Mme. Levielle as Inez, and Sig. Moriami as Nelusko were well received. The Chorus, of course, was heart-rending, and the orchestra no better than it should be. The ship scene, that pous asinorum of all managers, was the best which has been produced in America, but that is saying very little.

On Tuesday evening, Oct. 1, we had a rare pleasure in the shape of a RUBINSTEIN concert, No. 6 of the series;—and how we do miss them now that they are over! The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Egmont".....	Beethoven.
Orchestra.
Concerto, G major, No. 2.....	Rubinstein.
Anton Rubinstein.
Poets, "Kommt Ein Schlanker Bursch gegangen.".....	Weber.
Freischütz.....	Mlle. Louise Liebhart.
"Il Pirata," Fantasia for Violin.....	Ernst.
Henry Wieniawski.
Duet, Per valli, per boschi.....	Blangini.
Miles. Liebhart and Ormeny.
a. Nocturne.....	Field.
b. Menuet, B Minor.....	Schubert.
c. Ballade, G minor.....	Chopin.
Anton Rubinstein.
Alma Ruzsa.....	H. Wieniawski.
Henri Wieniawski.
Aria, from "Saffo".....	Pacini.
Mlle. Louise Ormeny.
{ Songs, without words. A flat, A minor, B major.
{ March, Midsummer Night's Dream.....	Mendelssohn.
Anton Rubinstein.

These concerts afford the singular spectacle of a large audience, composed, in the main, of people not truly musical, listening attentively night after night to a programme of classical pieces interpreted by two instrumental artists, both of whom are thoroughly severe in their style of playing, and perfectly free from those tricks and mannerisms which are sure to catch the fancy of an average audience.

From the success of these concerts some people, with more charity than logic, draw the inference that our public has suddenly become "musical," and then they proceed to talk about the career of an artist being "incomplete" until the opinion of Paris and London has been "sanctioned by the voice of New York."

It is only a little while since I heard Nilsson sing "Old Folks at home" in Steiway Hall, and, having heard that lady frequently in "Paris and London," and knowing something of the music which she sings there, I could not help wondering what she thought of us. I suppose she must have been thinking how she would feel when the world's opinion had been "sanctioned by the voice of New York."

And now WIENIAWSKI, being encored, responds with a negro melody, evidently under the firm conviction that it is our national air. The love of art, and most of all in music, is no mushroom growth, and never will be, nor is such a thing to be wished. We have abundant cause for rejoicing in the fact that we are advancing towards a purer taste and a higher standard in music, and that our progress is plainly evident, bringing with it the means of constantly increasing advancement. Let that suffice.

It is therefore not purely an art motive which brings the general public to hear Rubinstein. To an observer it appears that nine-tenths of the auditors are charmed by his virtuosity, which alone would be a stock in trade for a dozen ordinary pianists, and that the fine, subtle genius, the real essence of his playing, is by the majority unnoticed. For example, one of the pieces in which he has found most favor is an arrangement of Beethoven's March from the "Ruins of Athens." His first rendering of this brought down the house at once and it has since been several times included in his programmes "by particular request." Now this march, being utterly commonplace and cranky, affords no scope whatever for the exercise of the pianist's finer powers; but its mediocrity is redeemed by a decrescendo which I have never heard equalled, or ever approached, though all that the piece requires is simply virtuosity of the highest order. Compare the applause which follows with the faint praise called forth by a rendering of Chopin's Ballade, in which the piano sings like a siren, where the true nature and greatness of the artist are clearly revealed.

At the seventh Concert, on Thursday evening, Oct. 3, he played Weber's Concertstück, a Fantaisie by Chopin, and a Serenade and Caprice of his own. The eighth concert came Oct. 4, and its greatest feature was the "Kreutzer Sonata" played by Rubinstein and Wieniawski; a performance which, it is safe to say, has rarely been equalled. At this concert Rubinstein played a Sonata by Weber, and two of his own pieces: Melancholie, and Quadrille, de la Fantaisie Le Bal. Wieniawski played a Concerto by Vieuxtemps in A minor.

At the matinée, Oct. 5, Rubinstein's pieces were as follows:

Sonata, F minor.....	Beethoven.
"Warum" and "Abends".....	Schumann.
Scherzo, B minor.....	Chopin.
Fugue, C minor, D major.....	J. S. Bach.
Rondo. (Bülow's Edition).....	Ph. Em. Bach.
Gigue, A major.....	Handel.
Romance, F major.....
Barcarole, A minor.....	Rubinstein.
Valse Allemande.....

Last week the Rubinstein Concerts were four in number, and the programmes included the following piano-forte compositions:

Concerto, D minor.....	Mozart.
Sonata, op. 111, G minor.....	Beethoven.
Fantaisie: "Don Juan".....	Liszt.
Sonata, D minor.....	Beethoven.
Nocturne.....	Chopin.
Mazurka.....
Ballad.....	Schumann.
"Kriegeriana".....	Schubert.
"Moments Musicaux".....	Schubert.
"Valse: "Soirées de Vienne," (Schubert).....	Liszt.
Concerto, No. 2, F major.....	Rubinstein.
Theme and Variations.....
Song without words.....	Mendelssohn.
Kri King (Schubert).....	Liszt.
Turkish March.....	Beethoven.

On Tuesday evening, Oct. 8, the PATTI-MARIO troupe gave a last concert prior to their departure for the West.

At the Opera we have had three representations of L'Africaine, two of Faust with Mme. Lucca as Marguerite, one of Traviata with Miss Kellogg as Violetta, and one of Fra Diavolo, with Lucca as Zerlina. Of these impersonations I will write in future.

It is gratifying to learn, from the Annual Report of the New York Philharmonic Society, that the organization was never in better condition both musically and pecuniarily than it is at present, and that the coming season is one of great promise. The boxes are to be sold at auction on the 28th of October, the plan to be followed being the same as last season, when the boxes were put up at a minimum price of $20 and $30, according to size and location, and sold only to the holders of four or six associate-member's tickets. There will be a strong effort made to prevent persons who may arrive late at the Concerts or Rehearsals from entering the auditorium during the actual performance of music. At the close of each movement, or composition, there will be a pause during which those who may be late can enter and take their seats without interfering with the enjoyment of others. This rule, which is rigidly observed in many of the European cities, is an act of simple justice towards those who are disposed to listen to the music.

A. A. C.

Wanted: a National Hymn.*

That for which the German people yearned during long, long years, has been accomplished; we again possess a German Fatherland, existing no longer merely in lays and songs; it is really and truly an established fact. If the rejoicing over the work, at length successful and crowned with victory, is not so loudly manifested as might have been expected, it is because our sorrow is still too fresh; it is because the sanguinary struggle out of which the new German Empire has arisen, has already cost, and is still costing, too many tears.

The awakening of Barbarossa is no longer a hope of the future, and the ravens no longer fly around the mist enveloped mountain; the hero has taken up his sword and shield, and come forward before the people that have had solely their want of unity and their dismemberment to thank for their unhappy fate, and who, if only combined in an offensive and defensive alliance, are unconquerable. The terrible time when Germany knew no Emperor is at present past; the German eagle has again raised its head, and with its mighty pinions will protect all its children as it never protected them before.

The German Empire went to rack and ruin, and nothing remained of its prodigious grandeur but the name; even this became the subject of ridicule. New life can never be infused into a corpse; the utmost science can do, is to cause the corpse to appear alive by a series of galvanic twitches. Just in the same way, the new Germany can never, never arise from the ruins of the old. It must be built afresh from the very foundations; it can retain none of the ancient combinations and compacts with which such unutterable humiliation and shame were connected. It is not the two-headed eagle, decked out in vain array, and which first sprang up in the course of the fourteenth century, that can be the symbol of the new Empire; it is the original black one-headed king of birds, on the silver field, that must lead the empire on its new career of glory.

We have again a German Emperor; but the new German Empire is as yet deficient in its outer symbols as in other things. Centuries ago, the old and venerable town of Aix-la-Chapelle, where the Emperors used to be crowned, was changed for Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, it being the custom to place the effigy of the newly crowned sovereign in a niche of the Römer. Now it is a remarkable fact that the effigy of the Emperor Franz, the last German Emperor previous to the long, long interregnum, now at an end, was destined to fill the last niche then in the building. It was certainly a strange freak of chance, or, rather, a significant hint of Fate, who, even in this purely accidental accessory, appears to recommend a complete rupture with the past. The pure gold crown of eight fields richly adorned with precious stones; the Gospel upon which the Roman-German Emperors were sworn; the magnificent sword of Charlemagne, a Moorish-Norman work of art of the first class; the coronation mantle, originally made by Moorish artists for the Norman, Robert Guiscard; and, lastly, the sword of St. Mauritius, which, even now, at the solemn reception of the members of both Houses, on the opening of the Reichsrath, is borne before the Austrian Sovereign by the Lord Chamberlain-in-Chief—will these old and venerable insignia be claimed by the new German Empire from those who now hold them? We cannot say, and must leave the question to be decided by others very different from ourselves.

* "Ein Wort zur Zeit," by W. Laskowitz. New Berliner Musikzeitung.

But what is the meaning of all this in this place?—I hear many of my readers enquire. Have a little patience; it is most intimately connected with what follows, and for that this is certainly the fitting place: The German Empire must be reconstructed from its very foundations; there is one thing, therefore, in which it must not be behind other nations, and that one thing is—a German National Song. This may strike many as a trifle not worth talking of; to many it may even appear ridiculous; yet it is of such importance as to be, at any rate, worth a few words.

The Frenchman has his: "Allons, enfants de la patrie!" The Englishman has his "Rule Britannia!" The German has—Nothing!

It is a well-known fact that the world-historical battle-song of the French was written by an officer of engineers, Claude Jos. Rouget de L'Isle, in 1792, before the departure of the French volunteers from Strasbourg for the army of the Rhine. It was consequently at first entitled "The Battle-Song of the Army of the Rhine"—"Le Chant de Guerre de l'Armée du Rhin." But in Paris, where its origin was unknown, it was subsequently named the "Marseillaise Hymn"—"Hymne des Marseillais." It is universally known that the French were inspired by it in all their battles, so that Klopstock is reported to have said to the author, on meeting him in Hamburg: "Terrible man, you have slain thousands of my brothers." We will leave out of consideration the myth-like story of the origin of the Marseillaise, how the words were written, and the music composed, in one night, etc., so that the next morning the troops marched off singing and playing it; we will not examine this story, which is certainly improbable, nor investigate how far there is any foundation for saying that we owe the melody to a musician named Stoltzmann, chapelmaster at the court of the Elector Palatine, who lived from 1770 to 1790, at Meersburg, on the Bodensee, and from a mass by whom Rouget de L'Isle annexed, in true French fashion, the "Credo" for his own production. Be this as it may, we cannot deny that Rouget de L'Isle, with his song, hit the right nail on the head, when a fuse was required to set light to the thoughts of freedom lying pent up in the hearts of the great masses. Thousands immediately sang his song; thousands were inspired by it to combat for the freedom of their native land, and it became consequently a thorn in the side of those who wished to keep down the freedom of the people, and smother at its birth every yearning for independent movement, though they had always on their lips fine phrases about the "Grande nation," "La gloire," etc. The Marseillaise was sternly proscribed, and it was not till the utmost popularity was needed for the wicked war planned against Germany, and till every possible resource had to be brought into play against those who still raised their voices in opposition to the cry of establishing the natural frontier between France and Germany, that the gagged and fettered Marseillaise was set free. This time again "Allons, enfants de la patrie" did not fail in its effect. It is true that it cannot bolster up a system of mere empty words, and that where nothing is to be had the king loses his right. The boast about marching at the head of civilization sounds like insane sarcasm, now that we see what the French people have become. They confer civilization, freedom, and prosperity, upon other nations! It is probably all over with their fine phrases. Let the French, however, only once more possess a sure and firm edifice of state behind them, and the Marseillaise will not fail to attain its object. Though the nation forgot Rouget de L'Isle, and it was the July Revolution which first gave the Pindaric fragment fresh vigor, and invited it to soar upward once more, thus also snatching the author from oblivion; though the author refused the sum voted by the Chamber of Deputies, as well as a pension subsequently offered him by the Citizen-King, Louis Philippe, his name was once again on every one's lips, and so was, even in a greater degree, his song. Death, with his all-powerful "Allons, enfants," called him away, on the 27th June, 1836, from Choisy-le-Roi, where he had long resided in retirement and poverty; but the name of Rouget de L'Isle is inscribed in the Book of Immortality.

The Englishman has his "Rule Britannia" and his "God save the King!" At all times, and under all circumstances, both these national airs have stood him in good stead, and never failed him! Even for England, it was a hard time, when the proud Corsican, like a scourge in the hand of Fate, trod down the plains of Europe with his iron heel. Despite the victories gained by Wellington in Spain, and by Nelson at sea, despite the favorable position protecting England from direct attacks of the foe, the country suffered many a heavy blow, followed by despondency among the people. It was then that "Rule Britannia" and "God save the King" revived their sinking courage. At that time, Angelica Catalani was in London, the great singer who, with her all-powerful voice, moved every one to ecstasy. It was she who by her singing infused the fire of new enthusiasm into men's hearts, and thus rendered simultaneously an immense benefit to the prime minister of England and her manager. Whenever the report arrived of a victory achieved by Napoleon, the premier got the manager to place Mme. Catalani at his disposal. Large posters announced to the people that the lady would sing both national airs, at seven o'clock in Covent Garden, and eight o'clock in Drury Lane, etc. The streets leading to the two houses were black with human beings. Every one wanted to hear her. Every one wanted to revive his courage with her magnificent singing. Like a supernatural being used Catalani to appear before the public, and when her mighty voice rose above even the full sound of the orchestra and of a large chorus, yes, when her notes soared, as though upon the pinions of an eagle, above even the joyous thousand-throated strains of the audience who had joined in; when, looking like Juno descended from Olympus, she raised her hands upwards to the Creator at the words: "Send him victorious, Happy and glorious," there broke forth a storm which shook the whole house, and caused the hearts of all present to pulsate with a feeling of patriotism which raised them above every momentary misfortune.

There can be no question that the principal portion of this patriotic effect must be attributed to Angelica Catalani. An artist like her could achieve the most eminent success with the most meaningless compositions; she really sang hardly anything but the most vapid stuff by Percitta, Portugallo, and other long since forgotten Italians, just as she was the first to introduce Rode's Violin Variations as a vocal piece. Notwithstanding this, there exists in the English National Hymns, a primitive and sturdy power, which carries the hearer away, and which we vainly seek in our German National Hymns.

We say: German National Hymns, for, as the German Fatherland was situated up to the present date, there could not, of course, be only one such German hymn. The numerous little Fatherlands stood side by side perfectly independent of each other, and there could be no question of their having sought in common, least of all, a national song; each had to find vent in its own way, for its own especial patriotic feeling. The difference was certainly only a trifle, but each state distinguished itself thereby from its powerful neighbor. And had not even the latter contracted a loan abroad to procure a national hymn? Yes, certainly, for it was the English melody of "God save the King," and some originally Danish words, written by Heinrich Harries, in 1790, for the birthday of King Christian VII., which supplied the foundation for Prussia's "Heil dir im Siegerkranz."

This annexation was, however, a fortunate one. The German imitation of the verses, written by Gerhard Schumacher, in 1793, was certainly a success. And what about the melody sprang from the muse of Henry Carey? It would be difficult to find another, which, for simple and yet grand proportions, is so well adapted for great masses. Can it, however, become a German national hymn? Hardly: in the first place there is an obstacle in the fact that several of the smaller states which were formerly independent, as well as of those which are so still, have adapted special words written after the Prussian model, and suited to their own individual requirements, and set them to the music so happily appropriated by Prussia. It would be necessary to substitute a common text for all, and such a substitution is always a ticklish matter, leaving entirely out of consideration the circumstance that this text would have to be written. The attempt has frequently been made, but never with satisfactory results. This was quite natural. Such verses are nothing more nor less than occasional poetry, and what is effected in this line, when the writer has to start by putting his inspiration in the straight-jacket of a given strophe, is generally nothing very striking. August Niemann supplied an instance of this a long time ago, when he began his song—which adheres closely to the Hessian imitation: "Heil unserm Fürsten, Heil! Heil Hessen's Fürsten, Heil! Heil, Ludwig, Heil!"—with "Heil unserm Bunde. Heil! Dem deutschen Bunde, Heil! Heil, Deutschland, Heil!" If all these good wishes were fulfilled, Germany would certainly have no cause for complaint.

Spontini's "Borussia"—words by Job. Friedr. Leop. Düncker, sung for the first time on the 18th October, 1818, in the Opera-house Berlin—deserves as little consideration here as Neithardt's "Preussenslied." Apart from the fact of their both being specifically Prussian, they are anything but national songs. The notion of remodeling, and of casting into a new shape, the words of Spontini's "Borussia," so as to adapt them to the present day, was circulated in several papers some weeks ago. But it was an unhappy one; the composition was never popular, and never will be. The same may be asserted, in a certain sense, of the "Preussensied." It is an admirable and peculiarly effective composition—when sung by a Zechiesche; but the instrumental treatment is little adapted for even a simple chorus, far less for great masses. We have ourselves very often heard the people fashion the unpopular melodic progressions to suit themselves, and we know what the song becomes in the operation. We have heard, also, just as often, what the words become, or rather what they do not become. As a general rule, there are some hitches in the machinery, even during the first strophe, and it is most certainly brought to a perfect standstill in the second. The strophes, and even the separate lines, are too long, the consequence being that the words cannot be retained in the memory of the masses.

What remains to be done?—We have a new German Empire, and we have a new German Emperor, but we have no national song. When, in times gone by, the Empire existed in strength and grandeur, it was without such a song, just as it is now, but it did not require one, because song was, at that period, the property of an exclusive artistic class. When song was subsequently beginning to be common property, the splendor of the Empire had long been a thing of the Past; its children were tearing each other to pieces, and their hosts marched to battle to the strain: "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott." Once more the times have changed. It would, perhaps, be tolerably easy to arrive at some agreement, if the question turned upon a religious song; but what the masses now want is a national song of a lay character.

Of national minstrels we have certainly had plenty. If we look at the German Parnassus, we find a great number of songs referring with joy and pride to the German Fatherland, and bringing prominently forward this or that of its various characteristics, but there is not one satisfactorily expressing the feeling which, at this precise moment, causes the heart of every German to glow, when he thinks of the unification of his country, which has at last been effected.

What is the German Fatherland? The endless questions to this effect contained in an imposing number of verses are no longer appropriate.

Of the numerous patriotic songs of the Past, there are really only two that hit anything like the tone required, the consequence being that people still sing them far and wide. They are: "Ich hab' mich ergeben," and "Deutschland, Deutschland über Alles." The words of the former, written by Hans Ferdinand Massmann, in 1820, correspond only partially to the vigor which a German national song ought to possess; it is the melody which has rendered the composition so popular among the masses. The composer is unknown; his work resembles a Thuringian-folk's melody, and can be traced back to about 1819; it is distinguished by the same simple and grand treatment as Carey's Hymn. The second of the two songs was written, in 1841, by Hoffmann von Fallersleben to Jos. Haydn's melody composed in 1797 for the Austrian National Hymn, "Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser." Do we want to be dependent on the Austrians for a loan? No one probably would agree to this: besides, Hoffmann demands the land "Von der Maass bis an die Memel, von der Etsch bis an den Belt" ("from the Meuse up to the Memel, from the Adige to the Belt").

Nothing, therefore, remains for us but to look round and see what the present has produced. It has been rich enough in instances of grandiose inspiration, and hundreds, including the best names which Germany may proudly call her own, have struck the chords of their lyre.

There was one song which flashed through the land like lightning; it was already somewhat old, but it suddenly resounded simultaneously in the East and in the West, in the North and in the South. Well, indeed, did the composer and the author earn the gold medal, for thousands and thousands, inspired by their song, marched to meet a hero's death on the field of battle. But is Max Schneckenburger's "Wacht am Rhein," with Carl Wilhelm's music to it, the national song we want? Certainly not, for, had it a right to be so, that right would already have been anticipated in 1841, by Nicolas Becker's Rhine-song, "Sie sollen ihn nicht haben." The circumstances to which these songs refer are merely temporary and special. Such songs lose their significance on the cessation of the special cause which gave them birth; to bring this about, there needs no poet to arise and brandish the lash over Max Schneckenburger, as Heinrich Heine whilom poured out his venomous sarcasm over Nicolas Becker.

Whether among the hundreds of songs published in newspapers, pamphlets, small volumes, and entire collections, since the ever memorable July, 1870, there may be one or two adapted to become a German National Hymn is a fact which it is not here our place to decide.

But it is the place of the German composer to do so.

We think that, in the preceding observations, we have satisfactorily shown what we need and what would evidently be received with open arms by the entire German people. Well, then, ye German composers, look around upon the Parnasses of new Germany, and see whether you can find verses which have clothed in words the mighty pulsation of Old Germany, which, simple and unpretending, but grand and true, appeal to the heart of every one among us, let him be noble or humble, let him inhabit a palace or a hut. Look around; it is scarcely to be assumed that you will search in vain. And when you have found the verses you require, marry with them your art which, equally simple and unpretending, but grand and true, is capable of clothing in tone even the mighty pulsation of Old Germany, and your offering will be received with rapturous delight. Unfortunately, simplicity and plainness have become as rare in musical composition as in other things. The eagerness of the time for rapid successes has attacked even the world of art. What is small and simple is left on one side, or even contemptuously trodden down in the dust; the young artist wants to conquer the world at one blow, and heaps Ossa upon Olympus. While he is struggling to carry out grand ideas, for which all possibly available means are called into requisition, he loses sight of what is simple, of what speaks to the heart and fascinates the hearer, and he achieves nothing. The great masters never considered it beneath them to devote occasionally their strength to what was small or simple; it was precisely in such cases that their genius frequently showed the most magnificent bloom, entrancing every one with its magic perfume, and contributing more than aught else to extend the composer's fame in places where nothing was known of his more gigantic works. But let us leave out of consideration the Titans of composition. What made Schubert so great and so popular? It was his songs. His name had already passed among the public from month to month, when his greater compositions were as good as unknown. To what did Felix Mendelssohn owe his popularity? Not to his grand instrumental and vocal works, any more than Schabert. It was his songs and pianoforte pieces, his art in small and simple things, which rendered him known in every village, and in every house. How simple and unpretentious, yet how artistic and effective, is he in such things! Were it otherwise, how could Mme. Joachim have lately achieved such a success with a modest little song like "Leise sieht durch mein Gemüth?"

In cases like this nothing more nor less than an act of self-abnegation is required. A melody for a national song needs no display, no expenditure of artistic resources, but only a great thought. This, however, is precisely the thing in which the world is so poor, the thing which only one among thousands can produce from out the deluge of every day trivialities. What we want is a thought for millions, simple and unpretending, but expressed with grandeur and truth, and transfigured in tone.

There has never been a grander period than the present for our native land; never has enthusiasm run higher. This grand period demands from every one of us vigorous action, to whatever grade of society we belong, under whatever circumstances we may be placed. This summons of the period is addressed to the artist as well as to others. The poets first heard, and then the painters followed step by step, the great deeds of the new nation of German brothers, rendering them immortal with pencil and with brush.

Music must not remain behind. As yet, she has done but little, though, certainly, it was she who, among the arts, came forward practically to assist in staving the tears of blood; at innumerable concerts and performances, she placed herself at the service of her native land, and earned the thanks of thousands.

May German composers not neglect the call made upon them: let them show in a German National Song what all compelling power lies concealed within the sphere of tune; let them show that it is this power, which, from generation to generation, can kindle the flames of enthusiasm at all times, and under all circumstances. May Music not forget to contribute her stone to the edifice now being reared in new magnificence and splendor!—Lond. Mus. World.

Mr. Lee's Theory of the Voice.

To the Editor of the "Musical Standard."

SIR,—On reading the paper read by Mr. Lee at Brighton, it occurred to me that he had not thrown new light upon the subject of "The Human Voice." The introduction of the laryngoscope has set at rest all theory as to whether the voice is a reed or stringed instrument—it is neither, but essentially a wind instrument. The term cord, or string, does not mean a round string like that of a violin harp. They are called cords, because they are capable of being drawn into a state of tension, or relaxed by the operation of muscles, and because they vibrate like the strings of a violin and harp; or perhaps, to make the comparison more strictly correct, the Æolian harp, acted on by the wind. The vocal cords are indispensable to the production of sound. The objection to the wind cord does not alter the facts that no person can produce a vocal sound without them, and that they vibrate during the emission of sound.

If the trachea be opened the power of producing vocal sound ceases, and returns on closing the aperture. If the upper portion of the voice again be removed, leaving only the vocal cords so that they can act by tension and approximation, sound can be produced, and whatever impairs these so-called cords impairs the voice, which returns again on their restoration, and unless they move in perfect relationship to one another, called parallel, the sound is imperfect. The lengthening and shortening of the trachea, in the production of grave and acute sounds has been theorized ad absurdum. What is regarded as this action in singing is the depression and elevation of the thyroid cartilage, and the action of the muscles pulling backwards and forwards, for the purpose of stretching and relaxing the vocal cords.

The flute or clarinet theory is erroneous, as we do not sing by blowing in at the top of the instrument, but by allowing the air to escape from below, which shows the voice organ to be more like the pipe of a church organ, with a piece of split leather or parchment put over the upper extremity. The talking machine exhibited in London about two years ago, shows this clearly, although being only monotone, it was not vocally a true anthropoglossist.

Mr. Lee alludes to the failure of voices, and to the reed and stringed qualities sought for as erroneous. I regard this property as the fundamental constituent of all cultivated voices, and as the beads of a necklace hang upon a string, so the various notes of a cultivated voice should hang upon this string, by which continuity of tone is supported in preference to disconnected tones; and thus the vibrative travelling and blending qualities of the voice are secured—it must, however, be understood that I am not advocating hardness.

That there are badly trained voices we all are unfortunately aware; but the decline of voices is not mainly due to improper mode in the great vocalists, stars that shine like meteors for a little while, and then go out. Whatever impairs the health, or weakens the frame, or shatters the mind, acts on the voice, and the arduous work of our public singers often breaks up their voices: while, if a man were to live a hundred years without bodily frailty, his voice would last as long, provided no tendency to ossification of the cartilages set in, which is one of the chief causes of vocal declension as age advances.

The physiology of the voice is a very important as well as an interesting study; and I beg to say that I approach Mr. Lee with every feeling of respect, believing that his pupils may be rightly trained, and produce even the very stringy and reedy effects which he does not advocate, but which I have studied to secure, and which, I am informed, singers go over to Italy for the purpose of acquiring, as one of the chief desiderata. I am, Sir, yours respectfully,

H. KEPLER.

28, Alma Square, St. John's Wood.

To the Editor of the "Musical Standard."

SIR,—The very arguments which Mr. Lee puts forward for subverting the established theories as to the production of the voice certainly tend rather to confirming them, at the expense of his new theory.

We have no means of ascertaining whether any sounds are generated below the larynx, but we do know that the ribs and bones of the body vibrate synchronically with the sound produced in the larynx. Mr. Lee advances as a new theory the modification of sound by the pharynx. Why, that is what is explained by any singing master in the first lesson.

1. "The vocal ligaments undergo no appreciable change in length, or otherwise."

2. "That since the action of the vocal ligaments from want of homogeneity cannot be that of strings."

3. "Nor from the absence of the alternating, approximating, and separation peculiar to reeds," &c.

1. It does not seem to have occurred to Mr. Lee that the same membrane, at a different tension (whether produced by muscular or nervous agency), will give a different pitch and it would be very difficult to detect by laryngoscope or any other means of observation, any alteration in the tension, proving the length of the vocal chords were not influenced by the tension.

2. That the string theory is to be abandoned, because the vocal chords are not so long, and not influenced in the same manner as fiddle strings, is absurd. We know that the change of pitch is produced more by tightening the string, and exerting a different pressure of wind.

3. Mr. Lee admits that voice cannot be produced without the vocal chords, yet he would almost ignore them in his theory, and lead us to suppose that we should get on as well without a larynx, which he treats as a mere stopper to the pharynx.

When he can prove by experiment what he advances I shall believe it; until then, I am content to consider it "all three,"—a wind instrument, a reed instrument, and a stringed instrument.

I am, truly yours,

WALTER H. SANGSTER.

Festival of the Three Choirs, at Worcester, England.

[We supplement the partial report copied in our last with the following extracts from the London Musical World, Sept. 21.]

Never was a long, great work listened to with more close and anxious attention than was the Passion music on Thursday, in Worcester Cathedral church. Whether the congregation will ever learn to join in the "chorals"—that is, sing the tunes to the accompaniment of choir, organ, and other instruments, as was originally intended, is questionable; we must not hurry on too quickly. We may further compliment Mr. Done on restoring certain pieces which it has been hitherto the custom to omit in London. Two especially may be singled out, viz.—the chorus, "O man, thy heavy sin lament," which, following the shorter chorus, "Have lightnings and thunder," nobly brings the first part of the oratorio to an end, and the grandly expressive air, "Up, my soul." On the other hand he has sanctioned some omissions, one or two of which (we have no time to specify) are anything but well considered. "Up, my soul" was superbly delivered by Mr. Santley, as was indeed the whole of the music assigned to him—not only that set to the words supposed to be spoken by the Saviour, but that likewise to which Pontius Pilate's sentences are allied—a somewhat irrelevant arrangement. The other principal singers were Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington (soprano), Mme. Patey (contralto), and Mr. Lloyd (tenor), who, as well as Mr. Santley, are deserving of the highest praise. The orchestra was excellent throughout; the organ part was played in masterly style by Dr. S. S. Wesley; Mr. Townsend Smith accompanied the recitatives on the harmonium (in a church far preferable to a pianoforte); M. Saindon executed in perfection the obligato violin part to the air, "Have mercy upon me, O Lord" (Mme. Patey); and the song directed in the original to be accompanied by two "oboi di caccia"—whatever these particular instruments may have been—was accompanied on two violas, (and admirably accompanied) by Messrs. R. Blagrove and Zerbini. The chorals all went well, and the better for being supported by the organ. One of the most successful achievements of the day was the magnificent and long (not too long) spun-out opening double chorus and "choral," the treble voices bringing out the old Lutheran tune of the "choral" with wonderful sharpness and clearness, above all the elaborations of the two choirs and two orchestras that sustain it. It is unnecessary to say more.

Mendelssohn's Lobgesang followed the Passion, with Mlle. Tietjens, Miss Alice Fairman, and Mr. Vernon Rigby. It was a fine performance; but the Bach music was ample for one day; and on a future occasion we cannot but think that the Passion of St. Matthew, with an interval of convenient duration, instead of the exhortatory and explanatory sermon which was intended to be delivered between the two parts, should be performed without a single omission, and, like the Messiah and Elijah, exclusively occupy the day. It would then be heard in all the splendor of its complete form. Who knows but this may come? We are making rapid strides; and we owe no little to our so-called "provincial music meetings." We should have stated that in the Passion, as in L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, some of the additional accompaniments and modifications of Herr Robert Franz were used.

The programme of the second and third evening concerts, each contained special features. At the first there was an ample and varied selection from L'Allegro and Il Penseroso, the well-known cantata composed by Handel, in 1740, a year after Israel, and a year before the Messiah. The first section a fact of which all our musical readers are cognizant—was set for the greater part to the immortal poetry of Milton; but there is another part entitled Il Moderato, the verbal text of which, by one of Handel's co-laborers, Charles Jennens (who helped to "compile" the words for the Messiah), was so commonplace that Handel himself could do little or nothing with them worthy his genius. For this reason Il Moderato has been justly deemed superfluous, and is most frequently omitted from performances of the cantata, which, indeed, can easily dispense with so silly and uncalled for a peroration. More about L'Allegro and Il Penseroso need not be written, so familiar is it alike to amateurs, to musicians, and to London audiences. The selection was somewhat incongruously ushered in by the overture to Alexander's Feast, which, however, being one of Handel's most spirited orchestral preludes, is welcome under any conditions. The solo-singers were Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Lewis Thomas, and Santley—all experienced adepts in the reading and delivery of Handel. Mme. Lemmens had a more than usually onerous task, singing not only the pieces set down for her in the programme, but also those set down for Mlle. Tietjens, who—rare event, where she is concerned—was compelled by indisposition to disappoint the public,—the unwelcome intelligence being conveyed by one of the stewards in terms as complimentary to Mlle. Tietjens as they were satisfying to the audience. Thus, among other things, the two important airs, "Sweet bird," and "Hide me from day's garish eye," both from Il Penseroso, fell to Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, who sang them in her most finished manner, and in the first was admirably accompanied by Mr. Ratcliffe on the flute. Mr. Vernon Rigby's "Mirth admit me of thy crew," Mr. Lewis Thomas's "Haste thee, nymph," (with chorus), and Mr. Santley's "Populous cities" (with chorus), each from L'Allegro, were also among the noticeable features of a performance generally good.

The second part began with a spirited execution of Haydn's symphony, The Surprise; terminated with the march composed by Mendelssohn-Bartoldy in honor of his friend Cornelius, the famous painter; and included a vocal selection—of which it is enough to say that Mmes. Lemmens-Sherrington and Patey, Miss Alice Fairman, Messrs. Vernon Rigby, Lloyd, and Santley were put down for various pieces, and that Mme. Patey was honored with an encore in the late Vincent Wallace's expressive ballad, "Sweet and low." College Hall was literally "cramped to inconvenience," numbers being obliged to stand outside the music room, in the lobbies, and on the staircases.

The third and concluding miscellaneous concert brought together as large an assembly as its immediate predecessor. It began with a very attractive selection from Beethoven's music to Die Ruinen von Athen, one of two show pieces (the other being König Stephan) which the then popular and fertile dramatist, Kotzebue, prepared to celebrate, in 1813, the "inauguration" of a new theatre at Pesti. The dramas of Kotzebue are well-nigh forgotten, but the music of Beethoven, as experience has shown, possesses a vitality which nothing can extinguish. Though intended for the stage, and effective on the stage—as a performance at the Princess's Theatre many years ago convincingly attested—this curious musical allegory is just as attractive in a concert-room. The chorus of the dancing and somersault-turning Derwishes scarcely needs scenic aid to make it understood. It speaks for itself in language too vivid not to be at once apprehended. A more characteristic masterpiece of his kind was never written. This chorus was sung, and the extraordinary orchestral accompaniment in triplets which goes on incessantly to the end was played with irresistible vigor, and an encore quite unanimous was the result. The remaining "numbers" included the light but brilliant overture—a miniature overture for Beethoven; other choruses; the well-known "Turkish March;" the Festive March (with chorus); the duet of the two Greek slaves, sung by Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington and Mr. Lewis Thomas; and the air for bass voice, "Delge, great Apollo," sung by Mr. Thomas. The whole was satisfactory. The Ruins of Athens was followed by a miscellaneous selection of vocal pieces, in which Mlle. Tietjens (who, happily restored to health, was welcomed with enthusiasm), Mme. Patey, Messrs. Vernon Rigby and Santley were engaged. This selection, which brought the first part of the concert to an end, contained nothing calling for special notice, with the exception of a masterly performance by M. Saindon of his own very ingenious fantasia on airs from Rigoletto, which drew forth rapturous applause and a loud "recall." Of the second part, which opened with a brilliant performance of Rossini's overture to Guillaume Tell (the last movement encored), and which, according to custom, terminated with the National Anthem (Sir G. Elvey's arrangement), it is enough to state that piece after piece, one more familiar. If possible, than the other, came in due succession from the lips of the majority of the leading singers; and that the great effect of the evening was produced by Mlle. Tietjens, Mme. Sherrington, and Mme. Patey, in the lively trio, "Le facio un inchino," from Cimarosa's most admired comic opera, Il Matrimonio Segreto (composed in 1802). So capitally was this sung and acted by the three accomplished ladies that the audience insisted on its repetition, and repeated it was from beginning to end. Of the other items in the selection there is really nothing to say, except that all were applauded and thoroughly enjoyed. The programme was terribly long, and indeed would have been quite long enough without the selection from the Ruins of Athens—which, nevertheless, amateurs must heartily thank Mr. Done for producing. That the audience generally did not find the concert over long may be gathered from the fact that very few of them retired until the National Anthem had wound up the ceremony.

The attendance in the church yesterday numbered 2,670 persons. The donations to the charity amounted to £236 11s. 8d.—strange to say, nearly £150 less than was collected on the day of Elijah.

Bach's "Passion Music" at Worcester.

A more striking instance of the growing taste of the English for the severe classical school, especially of sacred music, could not well be adduced than the large audience (we had almost said, perhaps more fittingly, congregation) which gathered in Worcester Cathedral on Thursday week last to hear Bach's "Passion according to St. Matthew."

That this work will in future take its place with "The Messiah" and Elijah as an invariable item in the programme of each successive Festival of the Three Choirs, and that it will form as great an attraction as the two latter oratorios, when it has become better known, there can be little doubt; and we venture to think that its success on its production at Gloucester last September, and again upon its repetition this year at Worcester, will justify the stewards in setting apart a day exclusively for its performance, which should be in its entirety. For although the excisions that were necessary in order to bring the day's performance within reasonable limits, were most judiciously made, and avoided as much as possible interfering with the thread of the narrative, yet many beautiful numbers had perforce to be omitted, much to our regret. There are those who complain of the number and length of the recitatives, which they call wearisome; and to such persons, possibly, the shortened form of the oratorio is a most welcome relief; but these very recitatives are full of beauty, and there is so much variety of treatment in the accompaniments, notably of those assigned to the various personages represented, that it is hard to believe that any one with any pretension to musical taste, and deriving any real enjoyment from the performance of such divine inspirations as the "Passion" contains, could seriously urge such an objection to the whole work being given as suggested.

The number of scores that were visible among the audience is indeed a healthy sign of progress, and seemed to indicate a woeful falling off in the ranks of those who are continually on the look out for their pet singer, and his or her solos, and who, when that bright particular star does appear, crane their necks, hustle those who are quietly enjoying the music, and create a general disturbance in order to obtain ever so small a peep at the object of their curiosity;—and to go very far to establish the proposition set forth at the beginning of this paper, that the art of true appreciation of such masterpieces is rapidly making its way among us.

We incline to think that no finer interpretation of this most difficult work has hitherto been given in this country; and the credit of this is no doubt mainly due to Dr. Wesley, under whose direction it was produced at Gloucester, and whose arduous task it then was to conduct the performance of a work that was entirely new to the majority of the executants. It is therefore no great matter for surprise if the whole went much steadier this year under the baton of Mr. Done than on the former occasion under that of Dr. Wesley, who, though he is one of the greatest living composers for the church (perhaps the greatest) and certainly the greatest organist now living, is universally admitted to be anything but a good conductor.

To Mr. Edward Lloyd, who was specially engaged for the "Passion," and but for the non-appearance of Mr. Sims Reeves would have sung in nothing else, fell the lion's share of the solos, the whole of the trying tenor recitatives being given by him with all the true feeling of a conscientious artist. The many beautiful alto solos throughout the oratorio were sung by Mme. Patey, whose rich voice and pure style gave especial effect to the aria with its lovely violin obligato, "Have mercy upon me, O Lord." Mme. Sherrington sang carefully, though not with so much feeling as we could wish, and pleased the majority by her finished singing. In that exquisite gem "Break and die," she thought fit to make a protracted rallentando in the concluding phrase, of which no indication has been given by the composer, and which is perfectly unwarrantable; the practice has arisen solely through the vanity of many of the singers of the present day, but we rejoice to say that there are artists who evince a laudable reverence for the intentions of the composer, and adhere rigidly to the text. Of Mr. Santley's singing of the bass music little need be said; that he sang well, cetera va sans dire. But special mention must be made of his delivery of the passages (accompanied, as our Lord's own words are throughout by the orchestra in sustained harmony) descriptive of the institution of the Lord's Supper, commencing, "Take, eat, this is my body," and preceded by narrative recitatives allotted as usual to the tenor voice. The beautiful recitative "Twas in the cool of eventide," and the following aria, "Up, my soul," were so finely given as to cause a feeling of regret that more solos, other than recitatives, had not fallen to the lot of this perfect singer.

The band, considerably increased in numbers, and composed, by the way, almost entirely of picked London professionals under the leadership of the veteran Sainton, was everything that could be desired. Remembering the number of former occasions on which the choruses have proved so far the least satisfactory part of the Festival performances, as to make one regret that the singers had not, like the band, been brought in a body from London,—it is gratifying to be able to record that not only was there no actual break-down nor even an apparent unsteadiness in this department, but that the chorus was undoubtedly the best heard for several years. There seemed to us to be a slight weakness in the foundation, and more bass voices and instruments would have been acceptable, but otherwise the parts were well-balanced. It was refreshing to hear the alto parts with such unusual distinctness, and the tenors strong without being boisterous. The employment of a few boys' voices was in places very effective, remarkably so in the first chorus, where there is a ripieno part for trebles who sing the melody of a well known Lutheran chorale; and in this case they were clearly heard above the tout ensemble of a double chorus with the accompaniments of the full orchestra. With regard to the chorales, opinions are divided as to whether they should be sung, as at the Oratorio Concerts, entirely without accompaniment; as at Gloucester, with organ accompaniment alone; or, as on this occasion, with the full orchestra and organ. There is no doubt that they were originally intended to be, and always were sung (the melodies, at least) by the congregation, while both orchestras—for two were usually employed—and the organ, at once supported the voices and supplied the harmony. The organ alone appears to us to be the most fitting and effective accompaniment, and in the hands of such a perfect master of the instrument as Dr. Wesley, who actually was playing at the performance under notice, would it not have been the most satisfactory? As it was, we have to reiterate the complaint that has been so universally made, that too little attention was paid to light and shade in these chorales. It may have been that both conductors (for the same failing was noticed at last year's Festival) thought fit to ignore the pianos and fortes supplied so modestly in parenthesis by Sir Stenford Bennett in his edition of the work, and considered that, as Bach had given no indication of his ideas in this respect, no marks of expression should be introduced on the authority of another. In accompanying the recitatives merely narrative, for which Bach furnished a figured bass only, an harmonium was introduced in the place of the pianoforte before used. This was a most welcome change, the former instrument being more in keeping with the sacred nature of the work, and the sacred building in which it was delivered, besides quite giving the effect of the soft stops on the organ, which many persons believed it to be.

To return to the subject of future performances of the "Passion" we will repeat our earnest desire that the whole should be given just as it stands, and, to fulfil as far as possible the conditions under which it was formerly given, and without which it is impossible to give it proper effect, that a sermon be preached between the two parts in the same manner as at Westminster upon its production in the Abbey. To raise it to the dignity of a religious service, and to cause it to be accepted as such by the congregation, instead of allowing it to be merely a performance of the most effective musical portions of the work, is what those who have the direction of the Music Meetings should ever have in view, and we can only hope that these few remarks may come under the notice of the authorities, and have the effect we so much desire.—Mus. Standard, London.

Rubinstein.

FIRST APPEARANCE OF THE GREAT PIANIST.

The New York Tribune says of Anton Rubinstein's appearance in that city:

Herr Rubinstein introduced himself with his D minor concerto. The first movement gave a fair but not an adequate idea of his brilliant execution; the second, with its beautiful andante, was a gem of cantabile playing; but in the closing prestissimo the full glory of his tremendous force and the magnetism of his touch burst forth upon the astonished audience. In his subsequent selections he seemed to grow better and better. Handel's Air and variations in D minor never could have had such an interpretation before, even from the old composer himself. Mozart's Rondo in A minor was exquisite. The famous march from "The Ruins of Athens" resounded through the hall with the splendor, one would have thought, of a full band; and Schumann's Etudes symphoniques received the most brilliant, forcible and sympathetic handling. It would be a mistake to suppose, however, that force is the predominant characteristic of Rubinstein's playing. He has the strength of a giant, but it is united with the delicacy of a poet. No one else can so completely gather up the full resources of the piano, and pour them forth in a torrent of grand and sonorous harmonies; no one else has so thoroughly mastered the difficulties of the most intricate and rapid execution; no one else is so brilliant, so fiery, so incredibly enduring; yet, on the other hand, no one can teach the piano to sing such soft and tender strains, or touch the keys so gently with a finger of velvet. The soft passages of his music are quite as wonderful as the more showy; the beautiful refinement of his expression is beyond praise, and no opportunity for display ever tempts him to forget it. It would be impossible to imagine Rubinstein glorifying himself with piano pyrotechnics, for he is not only a genuine reverential artist, but he is something more; he has the true fire of genius; and he is the only pianist ever heard in America of whom that could be said. In appearance he is somewhat rude and strange; in manner he is courteous yet abrupt. His stern Tartar face never lights with a smile. He puts away the humbug of flowers and wreaths with a calm, undemonstrative disregard, and sets himself to his work like a man whose heart is in his music, and to whom applause is nothing.

IN MR. WIENIAWSKI.

he has a worthy companion. This illustrious artist surpasses all our previous experience of violinists; we will not say as much as Rubinstein surpasses other pianists, but far enough to leave Viennetemps and Ole Bull in some respects far behind. His style is formed more nearly upon the romantic school of Paganini than of any other model; yet he combines with the peculiar fascinations of that school a beautiful classical polish and correctness. He, too, is an artist who reverences art, and knows how to forget the display of his own powers. What could have been more conscientious than his playing of the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor. It was given as Mendelssohn himself would have said it ought to be played. His tones are perfection—clear, sonorous, rich, true, and absolutely free from the occasional rasping which disfigures nearly all violin playing. His technique is phenomenal, and lastly he is sympathetic. Here we have all the requisites of a good player, to which we may add that Mr. Wieniawski's compositions are also excellent.

Opera in New York.—Madame Lucca's First Appearance.

(From the Sun, October 1)

One by one the great prima donnas, whose transatlantic fame is so familiar, take their places on the stage of the Academy of Music.

The latest comer, she who made her appearance last evening, is one of the most fascinating, versatile, and talented of all the European sopranos. In Germany they incline to believe that there is none to be compared to her. But though every city has its favorite, and though Mme. Lucca is a Viennese by birth and a Berlioz by adoption, and finds in this latter capital her most ardent admirers, still there is not an audience in Europe that does not listen to her with pleasure, nor an opera house upon whose stage she is not more than welcome.

But Mme. Lucca, charming as she is, does not fortunately constitute alone the company. It has finally come to be understood both by managers and public that a single star of the first magnitude surrounded by half a dozen of the fourth and a little nebulae of chorus singers does not make up an all-sufficient operatic constellation.

The directors have gathered together a really admirable company of artists. The chorus is large, the orchestra sufficient, the subsidiary parts well filled, and there is every indication of a season that will be pleasant for the public and prosperous for the managers.

"L'Africaine," the opera that Mme. Lucca selected for her debut, is one with which she is more closely identified than is any other singer. Meyerbeer always took a strong interest in her professional career, and in composing the music for the rôle of Selika had her capacities in mind. To her he entrusted the principal rôle, on which the success or failure of his work so greatly depended, on the occasions of the first representations of the opera at Berlin and London. And since then Madame Lucca has found no rival in the character.

Her welcome here last evening was as warm as she could have desired. At her entrance she was received with fervor, and the applause grew more earnest and hearty as the opera progressed, efflorescing in unskillfully thrown bouquets at the ends of the acts, and reaching its climax at the close of the opera.

The impression that Mme. Lucca produced upon her audience was beyond question a very favorable one. It would be ungracious to compare her with the great prima donnas who have preceded her. She has her own methods, and addresses her audience after her own fashion.

Just as singers are of different temperaments, so are their hearers, and so it happens that many who would find Nilsson cold, colorless, or unsympathetic would receive the highest pleasure from Mme. Lucca's intensity and fire. If a comparison might be so far tolerated between our late prima donna and our present one, it might be said by way of illustration that Nilsson's singing stood in relation to Lucca's as the pure white light of the diamond to the warmth and lustre of the ruby.

She is eminently an emotional singer and has a natural dramatic genius. Though small in person, her dignity and grace of manner give her an elegant stage presence. The first impression that one receives from her singing is that her voice is unexpectedly large and resonant and not specially sympathetic in quality, and that her reputation must have been gained rather from the rare combination of the actress and the singer, than from any marvellous qualities of the voice. But the opera may in part be responsible for this impression. Fully recognizing Meyerbeer's immense talent, and the labor and patience that have made his operas a mine of melodic wealth, we still greatly doubt if they set a prima donna before the public in the best light. And Mme. Lucca will, we believe, receive warmer public appreciation in some work of greater inspiration, and appealing more heartily and less intellectually to the hearer.

Of the other singers we can speak but briefly. Signor Abrugnedo, the new tenor, is somewhat of a disappointment. Signor Moriani, the baritone, is a very superior artist, an actor of fine ability and a singer of great purity of style and with an exceedingly beautiful quality of voice. M. Jamet is sufficiently well known. Whatever he did during his connection with the Nilsson company was well and worthily done. His disguise was so complete last evening that the audience failed to recognize him when he appeared, or to give him that greeting that he so warmly deserves.

In Mme. Levielle the company possesses a singer of exceptional gifts.

New York Philharmonic Society.

For the season of 1872-73—the thirty-first of the society—the following symphonies are promised:—Beethoven, No. 5, in C minor and No. 7 in A major; Haydn, "Oxford," in G major (first time); Schumann, No. 2 in C major; Rubinstein, "Ocean," in C major; Raff, No. 4 in G minor (new); Gade, No. 8 in B minor (new); Berlioz, "Romeo and Juliet"; Liszt, "Dante." Overtures—Beethoven, "Consecration of the House," in C major (first time); Mozart, "Magic Flute," in E♭; Schumann, "Manfred," in E♭ minor; Weber, "Oberon," in D major; Wagner, "Tannhäuser," in E major; Erdmannshofer, "Prinzessin Ilse" (new); Matzka, "Galilei," in A major (new). Wagner, Vorspiel from "Tristan and Isolde"; Liszt, "Hirtengesang" from Oratorium "Christus" (new). The first public rehearsal will take place on the 1st of November, and the first concert on the 16th, at which Rubinstein will play. The rates will be slightly advanced, as single seats for the season will be sold at $15 each, and the minimum prices of the boxes, to be put up at auction, will be $60 and $90 each. The society is more prosperous than ever. The receipts last year were $26,956; the expenditures, including dividends, $25,824; balance on hand, $1,132. As a result of last season's operations the sum of $15,480 was divided among the orchestra, $2,388 was paid to orchestral performers not members of the society, $830 was divided among eight solo artists, the conductor received $1,000, and rent consumed $3,530. The officers are George T. Strong, president; E. Boehm, vice president; D. Schaad, secretary; J. G. Beisheim, treasurer; C. Bergmann, conductor.—Weekly Review.

THE Boston Lyceum Bureau is flourishing. It makes music more of a speciality than formerly, and has engaged many of the best artists.

ARABELLA GODDARD informs us that she will return to the United States next season.

The Rubinstein Concerts.

The first concert in our Music Hall by Mr. Gran's remarkable troupe,—presenting as it did for the first time two of the greatest artistic celebrities of Europe, ANTON RUBINSTEIN and HERR WIENIAWSKI, with a good orchestra under CARL BERGMANN's masterly direction, and a programme most exceptionally choice and rich for a travelling concert party,—of course excited eager interest in the most musical portion of our population, and was largely attended, though there was by no means a crowd.

After the performance of an Overture, which, after successive announcements of that to Oberon and that to the Wasserträger, turned out to be that to Egmont (either of them good enough), and in the rendering of which the small but select orchestra seemed hardly as yet warmed up to its work, the weird, barbaric looking master and magician of the piano-forte, with his immense mass of hair and awkward movement, without a smile, or any sign of consciousness apparently of aught beside the single purpose of his music, and with a look upon his face as of one eaten up by the intensity of a life long absorption in his art, as if all the expression had struck inward, and what you saw was but the lifeless simulacrum of the man, approached his instrument, courteous to his audience if not gracious, amid applause which was but the forerunner of the outbursts that were to follow. The piece selected for his debut was the same as in New York and in many of his European concerts, his own fourth Concerto, in D minor. In considering the impression, composition and performance can not well be separated, for he is eminently a composer-virtuoso. We shall not undertake to judge or even to describe such a composition after a single hearing. It certainly did interest us greatly, hardly suffering attention to flag once or twice from the beginning to the end. The Allegro, opening quietly, unfolded steadily and logically, giving you the fullest assurance of an abundance of reserved power. The themes were beautiful and illustrated with great wealth of fancy. Passages most delicate and tender alternated with passionate crescendos waxing to stormy climaxes which made you listen with a sort of awe, wondering what might come next. Beauty, mystery and passion by turns predominated. The orchestration too was strangely beautiful, abounding in fresh and delicate traits. As for the principal interpreter of his own work, everything under the head of execution or technique must be conceded in the fullest perfection as a matter of course. The instrument has no difficulties for him; the mechanical is absolutely mastered and need not be considered, not standing for a moment in the way of that which it is meant to serve, the expression of musical thoughts and feelings. His tremendous force is not more remarkable than his exquisite gentleness and fineness; he strikes like the lightning (looking like a thundercloud), and he sings with the most sweet, insinuating siren melody. (Nor does he seem to know anything of you, or of the place, the audience, while he does it.) The slow middle movement was chiefly remarkable for its lovely cantabile:—a melody most humanly and sweetly sung, for some time on the piano alone, to soft accompaniment of opaline and subtle harmonies. Perhaps the spell was lost a little while, the song lapsing into less interesting sing-song; but in the latter part of this Andante he seemed to strike a vein of mystery, which, with the strange orchestral coloring, was singularly fascinating. The Finale, prestissimo, was less to our fancy; a wild freak it seemed of uncontrollable, long pent up savage humors, fiery, barbaric, full of diablerie; an uncanny true witch element was felt about one, and the man seemed a wonder-working gnome out of the bowels of the earth,—a little dangerous, not a being who could understand you. But for the entire effect, we never saw an audience more electrified. The plaudits were electric.

In the second part Rubinstein was the interpreter of others' inspirations. First, Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques, which we had heard done by Perabo and by Miss Mehlig, but never before with such consummate power and finish, such sure and perfect lifting of its every thought out of the tangle of continual thorny difficulties, such unembarrassed, pure, clear, full expression of its essential music, as it was now. It is a very earnestly musical audience which can sit intently listening through that very long, elaborate, profound series of variations, a continual strain upon the deepest faculties of thought and feeling; but this time we perceived no flagging, so perfect was the rendering.

The group of three pieces with which Herr Rubinstein closed the concert showed the great variety of his interpretative resources in still new lights. The Air and Variations in D minor from one of Handel's Suites was performed as no other man could do it, doubtless, and there were marvellous contrasts of beauty and tremendous power. But was all that truly Handel? Some of it seemed essentially modernized; such storms of passion or brute energy as he lashed certain variations into, surely are not obviously suggested by anything in Handel's Suites! The Rondo in A minor by Mozart, one of the little gems of his finest art and fancy, was delicious in this strong giant's nice and tender handling; he refined it to an almost Chopin-like subtlety and grace, yet honestly, importing nothing into it which it did not of itself contain. The "Turkish March" of Beethoven was a transcription, an excessively brilliant piece of virtuosity. He took it at such lightning speed that one is puzzled to conjecture what order of spirits (surely none with mortal feet) could "march" to it; and he hushed the house completely by a decrescendo more finely graduated than we ever heard before, more slowly vanishing to nothing.—On the whole Rubinstein appeared to us to realize the larger part of all that has been claimed for him, impressing us as a man of marked individuality and genius both as composer and interpreter, charged with a strange electric fire, master of all that is beautiful and lovely as well as of volcanic forces in his wonderfully various interpretations, but at the same time prone to not a little of exaggeration and extravagance.

In HENRI WIENIAWSKI we were listening to one of the world's greatest violinists. To hear Mendelssohn's perfect Concerto in E minor played by such a master was a delight without alloy, unless it came from circumstances not intrinsic to the musical experience as such; nor indeed can we compare it with anything in our memory, unless it be Joachim's playing of the Beethoven Concerto or of Bach's Chaconne, &c. We did not understand why Wieniawski was announced as "the only rival to the memory of Paganini," or why he should be placed in such a category. The art which he revealed to us on Monday evening is something of a far nobler, purer character than we have ever associated with the Italian "Wizard of the G string," whose gift was so sensational and so contagious, bewitching younger aspirants into a questionable devotion to the mere tricks of the violin. But here we had classical violin playing in its purity, applied to one of the worthiest and most arduous tasks. Often as we have heard that Concerto played well, we never realized the half of its full beauty until now. Such large, full tone, such infallible truth of intonation, such perfect ease and finish in all points of execution, such breadth and fair consistency of style, and such fine feeling and pervading poetry, instinct with the inmost spirit of the composition, assimilating all the grosser elements that have to enter into its outward embodiment, so that it seemed just to breathe itself upon the air, were proof enough of the consummate artist. In the second part he played a couple of his own compositions: the first a "Legend," full of poetry and a fine fairy atmosphere, which the mysterious mingling of bassoon and brass tones at the beginning, and indeed the orchestral accompaniment throughout, brought home to the imagination. Some of the purest, tenderest expression we have ever heard from strings or human voice, occurred in passages of that performance. It was followed by a fantasia upon Russian Airs, very brilliant and full of virtuosity, but never offensive to good taste.

Of the two singers we have not much to say as yet. Mlle. LIMBHART, who has figured long and favorably in London concerts, showed a clear, sweet, flexible soprano voice of good power, and a great deal of facile florid execution in the old Handel air, "Sweet bird" from Il Penseroso, with the bird-like flute accompaniment, which was nicely played by Mr. GOERING. Mlle. ORMEY, with a large contralto voice, and a rather crude style, conquered a recall by her energetic delivery of Non più mesta.

The programme of the second concert, Tuesday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven's G major Concerto, the loveliest of the tribe, and made familiar here by so many excellent renderings, was the piece of all others in which a Boston musical audience could fairly appreciate this wonderful pianist's power as an interpreter. It was indeed a masterly performance, showing a poetic, sympathetic insight into all the meaning of one of the most poetic compositions ever written even by a Beethoven, and such a faculty of bringing it all out in tones so pure, phrasing so perfect, accent so fine and true, rhythm so self-sustained, that there seemed to be no intervention of keys or fingers, or even of an individual playing; it was not an interpretation, (as we heard it well said), it was the music itself. We are only in doubt about his very long cadenza in the first movement. It did seem to us to wander too far out of the charmed sphere of the original, and in its crises of strong passionate bravura to become somewhat uncouth, speaking a language foreign to Beethoven. Yet its construction was very interesting, in some respects masterly; it not only revolved the themes of the movement out of which it grew, but now and then anticipated thoughts of the Adagio that was to follow. The orchestra, too, under Bergmann's sure and quiet leading, did their part sympathetically and well, with slight exceptions.

Schumann's "Carnaval" of course needs a key to the allusions contained in its twenty or more little pieces. The mere titles are some help, but not in every case. Nevertheless the swift procession of the motley crowd of figures, some of them exquisitely beautiful, some grotesque or enigmatical, is very fascinating in itself, whether you know them all or not. It is properly a piece for a parlor or small hall; the listening circle should be intimate; hence to the necessity of conveying all its subtlest traits to all parts of the great Music Hall we must ascribe the "somewhat heavy hand" with which he brought out, otherwise so perfectly, the whole shifting, delicate phantasmagoria. It was a wonderful exercise of memory, as well as of sustained and seemingly exhaustless strength; and yet it seemed no effort.

It was pleasant to hear one of John Field's quiet, delicate "Nocturnes,"—the prototypes of all that has been done in that form in a much larger way by Chopin, and in a hackneyed way by countless imitators,—sing itself so sweetly, limpidly and clearly through the great hall. What music there may be in very modest flights! Throughout his rendering of Liszt's transcription of the "Erl King" the audience were spell-bound. Through the piano-forte the whole story was told, or rather told itself, with the most vivid reproduction of the dramatic dialogue. The last words: "The child—was dead!" were actually spoken.

This concert did bring out the "Paganini" side of Wieniawski, and that mainly. By that side we remember him a dozen years ago in London; so that we were surprised and pleased at finding him so classical in Monday's concert. He too, like Rubinstein, is sovereign master of his instrument, and can play everything that is at all worth playing. His "Faust" Fantaisie reproduced not only the salient points, but many of the more recondite beauties of that opera with a fine sense and great ingenuity; the orchestration being highly suggestive, and his own execution, in every phase and form of technique or expression, beyond criticism. His "Carnival" (why cannot the great violinists leave that to the old clothes men of the craft?) certainly surpassed all we ever heard in its droll tours de force.

Mlle. Liebhart sang "Deh vieni" sweetly and according to the good traditions; only somewhat too consciously in manner;—the very opposite in that respect from Rubinstein! The Contralto lady has abundance of the raw material of voice, which doubtless might be trained to some artistic use, but much of her song was shouting, and very badly out of tune.

THE PATTI-MARIO CONCERTS. We were cut short in our report last time, after giving what space we had to the great Tenor of by-gone days. We return to speak but briefly of the other artists, each in their way remarkable. Mlle. CARLOTTA-PATTI showed no such marvellous change of style as had been trumpeted beforehand. Perhaps her voice, so smooth and liquid throughout its whole great range, so fine peculiarly in the highest notes, has gained something of fullness and roundness in the lower and middle tones; but she is the same facile, finished, bird-like vocalizer, executing all sorts of runs and trills, arpeggios, echoes, and what not with the precision of a musical box, without much soul or feeling, yet with a good-natured pleasant way. Proch's Variations were warbled even more finely than by Mme. Peschka-Leutner, though in a more slender voice. Very brilliant in the same way were the "Carnival" variations, and Auber's "Laughing Song." "Caro nome," from Rigoletto, "Ah, forse à lui" from Traviata, and above all the "Shadow Song" from Dinorah, were suited to her best powers. But there was nothing true or simple in her "ballads." Miss CARY, on the contrary, by her almost perfect rendering of "Kathleen Mavourneen," almost reconciled us to its hacknied sing-song. Simply and charmingly she bore her part in the little Italian duets with Mario; while in her larger efforts, such as the Page's song from the Huguenots, "Orla sull' onda" from Il Giuramento, and "Ah quel giorno" from Semiramide, she sang better than ever before, in a large, true, honest style of singing, which every one enjoyed.

TERESA CARRENO, the child pianist who excited our deep interest nine years ago (her last concert in Boston was given in the Music Hall, with the Great Organ, "on the occasion of her tenth birthday") comes back to us a tall and beautiful young lady, and an accomplished artist, as her intelligent, clear rendering of the Mendelssohn Concerto in G minor, with orchestra, proved well enough. So too the Rondo Capriccioso and the Chopin Ballade in A flat. There is a certain Spanish fire in her performances and an impatience of manner which somewhat disturbs the pure impression of her classical interpretations. In bravura pieces she has great brilliancy. Her own compositions, mostly in Waltz form, and following in the track of Gottschalk, not without cleverness, were slight additions to the programmes. M. EMILE SAURET, the violinist, pupil of Vieuxtemps and of Wieniawski, is not older than Carreno. He played Spohr's eighth Concerto ("in modo d'una scena cantante") like a master, and in all his renderings (Ernst's Fantasia on Hungarian airs; the Ballade and Polonaise, the Reverie, &c., by Vieuxtemps; Wieniawski's Fantaisie on Russian Airs; Ernst's on themes from Otello; Paganini's "Witches' Dance"; above all in a remarkably full transcription of the Sextet in Lucia), he gained continually on the admiring sympathy of his audience. There was a soulful tenderness and purity in his rendering of certain thoughtful and poetic pieces, quite as rare as his great technical ability. The "Kreutzer" Variations were beautifully played by him with Teresa Carreno; very seldom do we hear a violin ascend into those high-east regions with so pure an intonation.

Symphony Concerts.

The eighth annual series of ten concerts originated by the Harvard Musical Association is now publicly announced. These regularly returning feasts of the noblest orchestral music are so well established, their motive and design and quality so well appreciated, that there is no longer need of any argument to prove them worthy of attention. By their fruits they are known. A glimpse of what is promised now (so far as the arrangements are completed) will give the best assurance that their prestige will be fully kept up, and that the approaching series will be quite as interesting as any that has gone before. One feature of the programmes is the uncommonly rich list of noble concert arias with orchestra, by Handel, Bach, Haydn, Mozart, &c.,—works seldom or never heard here hitherto. Another, not quite certain, but which the Committee are resolved to realize if possible, will be the introduction of some choice vocal works employing a chorus of mixed voices. The list of solo artists will be found unusually attractive. The Symphonies, Overtures, Concertos, &c., so far as they can yet be named below, speak for themselves. The star prefixed will indicate the compositions to be given for the first time in these concerts, and the double star those never heard before in Boston.

Mr. Zerrahn's Orchestra will be at least as large as it was last year, and in a number of its elements considerably improved. In the place of Mr. Hartdegen, who has gone to California, we have Mr. Hennig, who is probably without a superior as violoncellist in this country; while Welf Fries, and all the members of the Quintette Club, will be no longer occasional but constant members. An excellent first violin is gained in Mr. Hamm, whom we have heard as soloist in the Thomas concerts. Mr. Elts, our fine first bassoon, whom Thomas had seduced from us, returns to his old place; likewise the capital viola player, Mr. Heindl. Mr. Kutzleb's oboe will not forsake us, and a superior second clarinet (Mr. Whittemore) will be coupled with our valued master of that instrument, Herr Weber. Mr. Nieberg will still preside over the violins.

Music Abroad.

MUNICH.—The following are the particulars of the "Musical Academy," alias concert, given for the benefit of the National-Festival Stage Play enterprise at Bayreuth. It commenced with Herr R. Wagner's Faust Overture. This was as good as new to the public, having been played only once previously in Munich, when it was performed under the direction of the composer himself in 1865, at the Theatre Royal. Herr von Bülow was the conductor. On making his appearance, he was received with a storm of applause lasting several minutes. He gave the audience to understand by gesture that he did not take the ovation to himself, but considered it the due of the members of the orchestra, to whom he kept pointing. After the overture, Mme. Mallinger sang the "Prayer" from Tannhäuser, and Herr Hartigson, formerly a pupil of Herr von Bülow, played a Concerto by C. M. v. Weber. It must be mentioned that, with the exception of the first two pieces, there was nothing of Herr R. Wagner's in the programme. This was owing to Herr von Bülow's representing to the Committee that they would act most in accordance with Herr R. Wagner's wishes, if they chose works by the great heroes of days gone by, such as Mozart, Weber, and Beethoven. Mme. Mallinger then sang the "Letter Air" from Don Juan; Herr von Bülow played a Piano-forte Sonata by Beethoven; and Herr Vogl sang the cycles of songs entitled: "An die ferne Geliebte," by the same master. The concert was brought to a close by Beethoven's magnificent Symphony in C minor, admirably executed by the band. At the conclusion, the applause was most enthusiastic, and Herr von Bülow had to come forward some half dozen times, and bow his thanks to the public. The members of the orchestra were as demonstrative as the audience, and presented him with a silver laurel wreath as a parting memento, for Herr von Bülow is about to leave Munich again very shortly. Loud cries of "Hurrah, Bülow! Bravo, Bülow! Stop here! Stop here!" were heard from the spectators. Herr von Bülow was moved to tears. He attempted to speak, but words failed him. By the way, it appears that since then, an arrangement has been effected, by which Herr von Bülow will not leave altogether. Though he will not resume his former post, for which Herr Levi of Carlsruhe has been engaged on his warm recommendation, he will act as "Royal Bavarian Chapel-master out of active service," and conduct every year several operatic and other musical performances.—A new medal for distinguished merit in the domain of Science and Art was founded by the King on his last birthday, and conferred by him on Herr Siegl, operatic stage manager, and Mlle. Sophie Dies, Kammersängerin. For the way in which he sustained the part of the hero in Herr R. Wagner's Lohengrin, on the occasion of the centenary festival of the University, Herr Vogl has received from his Majesty a magnificently carved tobacco-pipe mouth-piece, representing the Knight of the Swan. We are afraid the celebrated bird will soon lose its whiteness and become negro (que) similima cygno," as the Eton Latin Grammar has it.

COLOGNE.—The new Stadttheatre was opened on the 1st inst., with Weber's "Jubel-Ouverture," a Dramatised Prologue by Dr. Wolfgang Müller, a Symphonic Prologue for full Band, by Dr. Ferdinand Hiller; and Lessing's Minna von Barnheim. Dr. Ferdinand Hiller's Prologue, to a certain extent, a piece of Programme Music in the best sense of the word, was most warmly received.—There is a report that Herr R. Wagner has promised to superintend the getting up of Lohengrin here, and to conduct the public performance himself. Hereupon the Kölnische Zeitung remarked: "Herr Wagner will, to a certain degree, resemble a bold knight who rides into the camp of his declared opponents." The following day, the subjoined answer from Dr. Ferdinand Hiller figured in a conspicuous part of the paper: "To the Editor of the Kölnische Zeitung. Your respects: local reporter speaks of Herr Richard Wagner's courage, in resolving to come here into the camp of his opponents. Nothing could have less of the Heroic about it. Tannhäuser and Lohengrin have been played and well received here for years past, and the composer may look forward with the greatest certainty to a complete triumph. As, however, Herr Wagner's party have done me the honor of considering me as one of his opponents, and of pronouncing against me, as such, a sentence of outlawry (and I by no means deny that the greater part of what Herr Wagner writes, composes, and undertakes, is repugnant to me), I must be allowed to remark that I have presented his concert compositions [the Overture to Faust, the "Kaisermarsch," and the Prelude to Die Meistersinger,] admirably performed to the public. To see Herr Wagner conduct one of his own works must interest his opponents as well as his adherents, the more especially, as he employs for the purpose a conducting-stick, and not German prose. I remain, with the greatest respect, your most obedient servant, Ferdinand Hiller, Kapellmeister."

NORWICH FESTIVAL.—The 17th music meeting followed, as usual, within a week after the Worcester Festival. The first two days were largely devoted to original English compositions. We copy from the Orchestra of Sept. 20.

After a general rehearsal on Monday the Festival proper commenced at eight o'clock in the evening of the same day. The doors of St. Andrew's Hall were opened an hour previously, and the seats were rapidly occupied. Sir Julius Benedict took his position at the conductor's desk, and the National Anthem was given with full orchestra and chorus—the solo portions by Mlle. Titiens, Mme. Florence Lancia, Mr. Cummings and Mr. Patey. An extraordinary demonstration of loyalty followed: cheering, clapping, and ejaculations of "God bless the Prince of Wales," displayed Norwich in a zeal and exuberant mood. Then Sir Julius resigned his baton to Mr. Arthur Sullivan, whose province it was to conduct his own "Te Deum." There is no need to traverse trodden ground in criticizing this work, the solos of which were sung with excellent effect by Mlle. Titiens, and attentively listened to by the audience. "To thee Cherubim and Seraphim;" and "When thou tookest upon thee to deliver man" had a specially happy issue, thanks to the great art of the vocalist. The "Te Deum" over, Sir Julius Benedict resumed the baton, and the performances recommenced with Haydn's "Creation," first and second parts. The soprano solos of the first part were assigned to Mlle. Titiens, and those of the second part to Mme. Florence Lancia. The tenor and bass solos of the first part were sung respectively by Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Santley; those of the second part by Mr. Cummings and Mr. Patey, Mr. Kerridge taking the tenor part in the trio, "Most beautiful appear."

Tuesday was a secular day, the chief features of the evening programme being Mr. Macfarren's new Cantata, "Outward bound," and Mr. F. H. Cowen's Festival Overture, both works being written ad hoc.

Mr. Macfarren's music is built upon Mr. John Oxenford's verse. The action is carried on by three characters—a mermaid, a sailor, and a sailor's wife—with chorus of sailors and their ladies. The work consists of six divisions—"The Embarkation," "The Sailor's Wife," "Weighing Anchor," "The Mermaid," "The Sailor and his Messmates," and "The Storm." The scene is laid in Yarmouth Roads. There is a chorus (in D major) expressive of the hopes of the sailors starting on their voyage. Then comes a contralto song (in G minor) for the sailor's wife—a simple, plaintive melody expressive of grief at the husband's departure. Admirably sung by Mme. Patey, it was stormily received, and when published is likely to be welcome in drawing-rooms. The next number is a short chorus in C major for male voices representing the weighing of the anchor and treated as "yo-ho" songs are conventionally treated on the stage. Number Four is a more ambitious piece of workmanship—the Mermaid Song, "Hark to me." The elaborations of this composition are somewhat in excess. The orchestral devices are ingenious and the voice part wrought out with florid effect and passages of immense difficulty. Mr. Macfarren's view of a mermaid is evidently as of one who has Suffered a sea-change

Into something new and strange, and whose singing should consequently be marvellous. But the "wundersame gralige Melodei" which his mermaid has to sing is beyond the capacity of most singers, though Mme. Florence Lancia came nobly out of the ordeal. The instrumentation however was the chief feature of the number. The following piece, "The sailor and his messmates," is a tenor song and chorus of commonplace character inserted sandwich fashion between the two important efforts. For No. 6, "The Storm" is even more aspiring than No. 4, "The Mermaid's Song." Storms have been done ere now in symphony and opera and overture; and Mr. Macfarren has hardly a thing new to paint. We have the familiar drum-thunder, chromatic lightning, and staccato hail; the wind gathers its forces together on the dominant of D minor and discharges itself on the chord of B-flat major, in which key the rain swells, the waves smash, the men shout and the women scream. Over it all glows the mermaid, whose voice is nearly drowned by thumping drums and resonant brass. The result is in fact chaotic; Mr. Macfarren however knows that sea-storms are usually that, and therefore his picture is successful. Amid the hubbub comes a call for the lifeboat, wherein the crew embark and are rescued. A short duet of felicitation between the sailor and his wife, a general choral prayer, and a jubilant coda, bring the Cantata to a close. Some wholly irreconcilable opinions have been put forth as to the merit of the Cantata as a whole. The truth lies between two extremes: the work is neither a masterpiece nor a fiasco, but a composition in the well known manner of Macfarren—reminiscent as to style, familiar as to phrases, nowhere out of the way, in nothing startling and in nothing contemptible. The hand of the skilled musician is visible in all, and the workmanship only becomes feeble when too much is attempted. "Outward Bound" may probably be repeated in concert-rooms: the storm however is a mistake.

Mr. F. H. Cowen's Festival Overture is a lively work, in which he resorts frequently to the dance rhythm, rendered still more attractive by bright and clever instrumentation. Written for a festival, it does not belie its jubilant claim. A chorus by Mr. Hugh Pierson formed another feature of this concert. Mr. Pierson is a Norwich man—one of those rare prophets who are appreciated in their own country. "Ye mariners of England" was sung with will and kindly received. Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture in E opened the concert finely. Mme. Trebell sang Mercadante's "Orsull" ondra" to rapturous applause, and Mlle. Albani came, saw, and conquered Norwich in the mad song from "Lucia," while Mr. Santley gave in magnificent style Hatton's setting to Herrick's poem "To Anthea." The good service lent by Mr. Cummings as the sailor in the new Cantata must not be left out of mention. Indeed Mr. Cummings, Mme. Lancia and Mme. Patey were all sans reproche, and invested their respective numbers with all possible interest. As much can scarcely be said for the chorus.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Slumber Song. 4. B to f. Franz. Arr. for 4 voices by Dow. 60

"Rest thee, my Sweet, in the shadow
Of the greenly glimmering grove."

It required some hardihood in Mr. Dow to touch, with an idea of improvement, one of the perfect works of Franz. But the arrangement into 4 parts is very skilfully done, and the result is a beautiful quartet. Indeed, considering that the chief beauty in Franz's songs lies in deftly woven harmonies, it may be doubted whether one would not enjoy them more in this style than the other.

Meeting I For Soprano or Tenor. 4. Eb to g. Millard. 50

"I watch for thee at evening,
And chide the weary time."

Very much in the style of "Waiting," which has been extremely popular. More properly a scene than a song, and is well calculated for success in a concert.

Fly, little Song, to my Love. 4. Db to d. W. A. Smith. 30

Sing to him. "Love and Lover must part,
True love is stronger than death."

Very pretty. Charming sentiment and sweet melody.

Thoughts. 4. Ab to g. Gabriel. 35

"I sit in the old loved nook
When the moon, like a silver sea."

Quite elaborate in its arrangement, and "Gabriel-like."

Oh, would that I were there. 3. G to f. Millard. 35

"My thoughts all fly to thee
Like joyous birds!"

A beautiful ballad.

The Meadow Stile. 3. A to f. M. F. H. Smith. 30

"The royal purple light died out Upon the silent sky—"

Very well written, which is half the battle. A very good specimen of the "gate" style of ballads.

Star of the Twilight. Song and Chorus. 3. F to f. Emerson. 30

"Star of the twilight, Beautiful Star!"

Words familiar, but the arrangement of the music (by R. S. Grandall) is new and very good.

We will vote as we pray. Song & Chorus. 2. C to f. Miss Morris. 30

National Song of the Good Templars. Song and Chorus. 2. G to e. Miss Morris. 25

"Rally, rally, this is the way,
To vote as you pray."

Very good Temperance songs, as they are very easy and melodious, and such ones are always in request.

Little Maud's waiting for me. 3. Ab to f. Geary. 30

"In the dell where the brooklets gently flowing
On the bench nath the old Willow tree."

One of Mr. Geary's perfectly charming ballads, with pretty accompaniment.

From the Cross uplifted high. Hymn Anthem. 3. F to g. Miss Boyd. 35

"Spread for thee the festal board, See, with richest bounty stored."

This very beautiful, but not difficult piece has been sung with marked success, previous to or during Sacramental occasions, and should be in possession of all choirs.

Instrumental.

Cupid's Heart Mazurka. 3. Bb. Lowell. 30

A neat, natty, Cupid y quality to this, out of the line of common Mazurka music, and which is very pleasing, and renders the title very appropriate.

Fleur des Champs. Bluettes Musicales. 4. Bb. Clara Gottschalk. 40

The direction, con delicatezza, in one part of this charming piece indicates its general character.

It is indeed a delicate, sweet bluet (or little flower) of melody, such as a refined, delicate lady should compose, and other ladies like. Try it.

Juristen Waltz. Quartet on 2 Pianos. Strauss, arr'd by Hahr. 1.50

The way to make anything sell, just now, is to put the magic name of Strauss on the title. The fine waltz loses nothing by the 2 Piano arrangement, and appears just in time for Seminary scholars, who need something brilliant for the next soiree.

Fourth Barcarolle. With Portrait. 5. G. Rubinstein. 50

In the common style of a marked melody with accompaniment in both hands. The running accompaniment in this case consists principally of successions of 8ths and 6ths. General effect, smooth, melodious, classical. Possibly should be marked 6 instead of 5.

Within the reach of a common player, but of course receives new grace from the practiced hand of a master.

Belle Espagnolle. Fragment de Salon. 4. Db. Krug. 50

Very elegant.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. a small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Moscheles in London.

1822.

The Paris season is at an end, and now Moscheles readily follows the invitation of friends to return to London. "There I found J. B. Cramer just on the point of giving his annual concert. He showed me two pieces of a Sonata which he would like to play in it with me, and he expressed the wish that I would compose a third piece to it for a Finale; only I must please put none of my octave passages into his part, as he cannot play them. I can refuse him nothing, so I must exert myself to make something analogous to him, the disciple of Mozart and Handel. He let me hear a portion of his new Piano Quintet dedicated to me; a genuine Cramer composition. I had to play over to him the three Allegri di bravura: "La Force, la Légèreté et la Caprice," which I dedicate to him."

The piece which Moscheles wrote, in all haste for Cramer's concert, as an appendix to his Sonata, is the Allegro of the well known "Hommage à Händel," to which he afterwards gave a completeness in itself, by composing an Introduction to it; and in this form he published it for two pianos, and then again for four hands upon one piano. This novelty made a fièvre on its first performance in Cramer's Concert on the 9th of May. "Glorious John" and Moscheles, of whom the newspapers asserted that "his execution is most wonderful, and more wonderful because he always makes the right use of his genius,"—to hear these two play together, and in a composition at which both had labored—that was "an unrivalled treat, an unprecedented attraction." Each had chosen a Broadwood instrument for the purpose; Cramer as usual, Moscheles only for this occasion. "The strong metallic plates which Broadwood uses make the touch heavy (as Moscheles remarks), but they give the tone a fullness and a singing character admirably suited for Cramer's legato, for his finger gliding from tone to tone so softly; I, on the contrary, for my repeating notes, leaps and passages in thirds and sixths, use Clementi's more flexible mechanism." Cramer's D-minor Concerto and the new Quintet, accompanied by his brother François, the favorite 'cellist Lindley, besides Dragonetti and Moralt, pleased infinitely. This Fr. Cramer was a good musician, a great admirer of his brother, with no power of original production.

Moscheles played his G-minor Concerto, which he had subjected to some alteration, for the first time in the Philharmonic and afterwards in his own concert, receiving much applause. In the latter he was supported by the charming Cinti, Klesewetter and Dizi, the excellent harp player. All went well and effectively together. "But we have rehearsed things in a very different way from what is customary here; for often they have no rehearsal at all; often half an orchestra runs through things once. So what do the singers do? They sing incessantly the few pieces which the orchestra knows and which the public are never tired of hearing."

A few days afterwards he writes: "What are all other concerts in comparison with that of the harp-player charlatan Bochs! I have only heard a little rehearsal of it, but I here write down the programme, although even that is a gigantic labor." In fact the incredible length of that concert is worth recording as a curiosity: here is the programme:

1. Overture to the Oratorio: "The Redemption," by Handel.
2. Aria, sung by Bellamy.
3. Air from "Joshua," Miss Goodall.
4. Duet: "Israel in Egypt."
5. Chorus.
6. Air from "Judas Macabæus."
7. "Semele."
8. "Theodora."
9. Chorus from "Saul."
10. March from "Judas Macabæus."
11. Air from "The Redemption."
12. Chorus from "Israel in Egypt."
13. Duet from "Figaro."
14. Alexander Variations ("played by myself.")

SECOND PART.

[To which the Public were admitted for half price.]

- 15 to 20. Six pieces from a musical Drama: "Bajazet," the music by a Lord Burghersh.
21. Violin Concerto by Viotti, played by Mori.
22. Recit. and Chorus from "Moses," by Rossini.
23. Quintet.
24. Duet from "Figaro," by Mme. Camporese and Carloni.
25. Air from "Jephtha."
26. Duet from "Tancrède," by Mme. Vestris and Beges.
27. Rec. and Air from "The Creation," sung by Zochell.
28. Rec. and Air from Handel's "Il Penseroso," sung by Miss Stephens, with obligato flute accompaniment by Nicholson.
29. Final Chorus from Beethoven's "Christ at the Mt. of Olives."

This gigantic programme throws even Astley's theatre into the shade, where on one evening they produce "a Scotch Hercules, divers rope-dancers, two Laplanders, two dogs and a bear."

The grand soirées to which Moscheles was invited, "to play before the high and highest nobility," were utterly against his taste. "What a different thing," he exclaims, "is music making in these hot, crowded places, before an unappreciative public, from our reunions among brother artists! Thank God! I never fared so badly as poor Lafont, whom the Duke of Devonshire tapped on the shoulder in the middle of a piece with 'C'est assez, mon cher;' I am applauded if I tickle their ears."

The bright side of the picture was good pay and the making of a career. There is also something honorable in being invited to a Chateaubriand's; and it is always very interesting to have taken part in the soirées of the great world. There one meets everybody, princes, statesmen, men of science, and has an opportunity to come in closer contact with interesting persons. Moscheles enjoyed particularly the acquaintance of the celebrated tragedienne Mrs. Siddons, and the distinguished actor Young, whom he praised as an extremely cultivated, amiable man.

The year begins with preparations for a new journey to England, on which he started in the middle of January. As in the preceding year he had moved about between Paris and Versailles, Rouen and other French cities, so now he hovered between London, Bath, Bristol, &c., being sought for both in the great metropolis and in the provinces. Young ladies wished in a few lessons to learn a fragment of his astonishing way of playing. They could not, to be sure, catch his gift of improvisation by listening to him "in a few finishing lessons;" for that required, besides the greatest musical reading, his inborn talent for letting the given theme vanish and reappear kaleidoscopically in ever new, surprising turns. But the repeating notes, thought these gentle ladies, and the rolling uniformity of the running passages, they also could acquire; and so the provinces gladly disputed his possession with great London.

To enchain him the longer, in their eagerness to learn, the ladies in Bath and in the environs of this great watering place, besides his engagements with concert managers, arranged soirées in the first private houses. He had only to come, to play, to pocket his laurels loaded with golden blossoms, and occasionally give a few lessons. In Bath he praises particularly the hospitality of the family of Barlows. "I am like a son in their open house; always my chamber is ready for me, and Miss Barlow is my most talented pupil too." Farther on we find some remarks about a Concerto in E major, which he began in this house and diligently wrought out.

But there is no lack also of droll notices. Thus among other things we find a ludicrous quid pro quo which happened to him, as a novice in the English language at the table of the Barlows. "I was asked to-day at the dessert, which of the fruits standing on the table I would take. 'Some sneers,' I innocently replied. Then followed first amazement, then loud laughter from all present who guessed the connection. Drawing my English with great labor then from conversation books and dictionaries, I had found 'not to care a fig' defined 'to sneer at a person,' and so supposed that fig and sneer were equally synonymous at the dessert (whereas the form was only figuratively used in the first instance)."

... Later we find Moscheles in London again: He writes: "I was at a so-called Oratorio Concert, one part Sacred, the other Secular. The public seemed to find the former rather too much for them, for they raved and stormed because certain pieces promised from the Donna del Lago were omitted." He was engaged for three of these concerts, and was satisfied with his success. "The public," he adds, "this time could be in good humor, since not only the recently omitted pieces from the Donna del Lago, but whole numbers of the opera were served up to them." Another time he writes: "To-day the Oratorio Concert gave, among other things, along with a deal of secular music, the whole Oratorio 'Palestine' by Dr. Crotch. How are the nerves organized, that can endure so much heterogeneous music! And yet this Dr. Crotch, this English celebrity, seemed to me but a very weak cast of Handel." Later, when Moscheles hears La Donna del Lago at the Italian Opera, he finds that the music contains much that is beautiful; "the most beautiful, unquestionably, the charming Ronzi de Begnis with her lovely singing."

His chief occupation at this time was the composition of the E-major Concerto; besides which the Scotch Fantasia, the altered F-major Concerto and the four-hand Sonata were prepared for the engraver. "I wrote a Gigue for the supplement to the musical journal, the Harmonicon, the publisher of which, Mr. Walsh, proprietor of the Argyll Rooms, begged me to send him what I pleased; he pays 5 guineas for such a little thing. The 'Charmes de Paris' brought me 20 guineas, and the first part of the 'Bonbonnière' the same. In spite of this I let much manuscript music lie unpublished; mere pecuniary advantage is not all I want; I must feel that there is progress, that there are no special faults in the new things; else I would rather not let them go out." In leisure hours he made a new arrangement of the Egmont Overture, and he used to call anything of that sort his "manual labor."

Every one who stood near Moscheles, knew what accuracy he required in the engraving of his compositions. His engravers had the most careful instructions as to where the leaves might be turned over; every note-head had to stand precisely in its place, every pause to be distinctly legible. "All this," he used to say, "contributes to precise playing, as well as to the right understanding of the piece; and if a man affects the rôle of a great genius, and writes so indistinctly that no engraver can read him, and his piece comes out full of faults, he is still no Beethoven by a long shot. He may do anything, but he has also his own engraver who knows how to read him. They should all in the first place compose like Beethoven; then they may write as they please."

[To be Continued.]

Our Theatre Orchestras.

(From the Atlantic Monthly for November.)

Among other questions of more or less vital importance to the musical cultivation of our people, there is one which forces itself irresistibly upon our notice, namely, the musical performances at our theatres. There is probably not a theatre in the country that does not boast something in the shape of an orchestra, which, besides furnishing such occasional music as may be required in the course of the drama itself, regales the audience with "choice and varied selections of new and popular music" between the acts. As a subject for æsthetic contemplation, the theatre "orchestra" is at best a dispiriting one; but in spite of the fact that it is, as at present conducted and constituted, in nine cases out of ten an almost unmitigated evil, we are not inclined to look upon it as a wholly hopeless case. The question whether music ought or ought not to be introduced between the acts of plays is an interesting one for abstract æsthetic discussion, but is unfortunately of no practical value. Whatever may be our opinion as to what ought or ought not to be little to the purpose in this case, as playwrights, managers, and orchestral players have long since settled what shall be. Dramatic authors from Shakespeare down to the sensationalists of our own day have introduced music into their dramas; musicians cannot be hired for less than a whole evening, and managers can never be persuaded to support an orchestra without "getting their full money's worth," or, in other words, making them play as much as possible. The theatre orchestra may then be regarded as an unavoidable fact. But it is the vile quality of the thing that we must principally protest against, rather than its possible inappropriateness. With lamentably few exceptions the musical interludes at our theatres are very poor, both as to the music performed, and the manner of performance. To be sure the management of the theatre have, at the outset, little reason to suppose that the audience is of a particularly musical cast. They have not come together with any distinctly musical intent, and whatever of music is introduced during the evening will no doubt be regarded by most listeners as merely a conventional make-weight in the entertainment. But it may be fairly supposed that a certain proportion of the audience are in some measure musically cultivated, or, at the very least, musically disposed, and we cannot see how the theatre management would lose by furnishing music that would be enjoyed by the more cultivated portion of the public, instead of more than boring them by such musical trash as is merely tolerated by the unmusical portion to whom good and bad music are equally indifferent. Of all perverted developments in the fine arts, bad music is the most insufferable. We can shut our eyes against bad drawing or false combinations of colors, and can turn away from bad sculpture and architecture with contemptuous indifference; but when bad music comes upon the field, there is nothing for it but patient suffering or ignominious flight. The "music" that the audience is doomed to listen to at many of our best theatres is beyond all doubt a serious drawback to the enjoyment of quite a considerable portion of our theatre-going public. The musical part of the audience constitute indeed a minority, but a cultivated minority have rights that are to be respected, especially where the uncultivated majority are manifestly indifferent.

To look at once at the darkest side of the picture, there is one point in our theatre orchestras about which the many are unfortunately not indifferent, and that is the cornet à pistons. It would be difficult to estimate the harm that has been done the popular musical taste and to musical performances in general by this, we had almost said diabolical, little instrument. Through its great popularity with the masses it has gradually crept from the lowest place in the orchestra up to the first and highest. It dominates the whole orchestra, and everything has to give way before it. A good cornet soloist draws a higher salary at some of our theatres than any but the leading violinist. As a solo instrument, the cornet has the smallest pretensions to anything beyond a certain penetrating brilliancy of tone, fascinating at first, but inexpressive and, after a while, most tediously monotonous. By means of modern mechanism the flexibility and power of rapid execution of the instrument have been greatly increased, but only just enough to tempt the skilful performer to try to push his instrument out of its proper sphere and to do things with it which no composer in his senses ever intended to be done. What the Rev. H. R. Haweis says of the amateur flute and cornet may be applied with equal force and justice to the professional cornet player:—

"There is a composure about the flute and cornet, an unruffled temperament, a philosophical calm, and absolute satisfaction in their respective efforts, which other musicians may envy but cannot hope to rival. Other musicians feel annoyed at not accomplishing what they attempt; the cornet and the flute tell you at once they attempt what cannot be done." In listening to some of the difficult variations, full of rapid running passages, flouriture and prolonged double-tonguing, that are attempted by cornet players, even such masters of the instrument as Levy, Sylvestre, or our own admirable Arbuckle, we cannot help a sympathetic recall of Dr. Johnson's: "Difficult, madam! Would that it were impossible!" Hector Berlioz, in his work on instrumentation, speaks thus of the cornet: "The cornet à pistons is very much the fashion in France to-day, especially in certain musical circles where elevation and purity of style are not considered as very essential qualities; it has thus become the indispensable solo instrument for contra-dances, galops, airs with variations, and other second-rate compositions. Continually hearing it, as we now do in ball rooms, orchestras, executing melodies more or less wanting in originality and refinement of style, combined with the character of its timbre, which has neither the nobility of the tones of the horn nor the haughty brilliancy of those of the trumpet, renders the introduction of the cornet à pistons into the high, melodic style of considerable difficulty. It can figure there, however, with advantage, but only rarely and on the condition of having only to sing phrases in a broad, slow movement and of an incontestible dignity. . . . Joyous melodies on this instrument will always risk the loss of much of their nobility, if they possess any, and if they are wanting in it, a redoubling of their triviality. A phrase which might seem tolerable when executed by the violins or the wooden wind instruments, would become odiously insipid and vulgar when thrown out into relief by the pungent, flaunting, unabashed tones of the cornet à pistons."

If this were the only evil, it might be perhaps bearable; but the cornet having, as we have said, gained almost undivided supremacy over all other instruments in the orchestra, has, very like a prime minister in office, given prominent positions to some of its less lucky relations. When any instrument plays a solo, the rest of the orchestra naturally expects to be thrown into the shade; but human lips are not made of cast-iron, neither are human lungs made of leather, and there is a limit to even a cornet player's powers of endurance, and he cannot play solos all the time. If when not dazzling the public by his love-lorn screaming and pyrotechnic flourishes in a solo, the cornet could only be allowed to repose on his hard-earned laurels, and give the rest of the orchestra a chance! But no. Like the comprimiento singer in our opera troops, who, "when not required by the business of his part, will please help in the chorus," the cornet, when not playing solos, must take its natural place in the body of instruments and do duty with the rest. But one cornet in an orchestra of the size we usually find in our theatres, is like Walter Brown pulling a fourteen-foot oar on one side of the boat and half a dozen children paddling with shingles on the other. The equilibrium of forces is destroyed. Thus we find that one cornet cannot exist without a second, and last, but by no means least, a trombone.

We might fill a volume in detailing the various abuses that this latter instrument has been put to, but will content ourselves with again quoting from Berlioz: "Gluck, Beethoven, Mozart, Weber, Spontini, and some others have understood the whole importance of the rôle of the trombone; they have applied with perfect intelligence the various characters of this noble instrument to painting human passions and reproducing the sounds of nature; they have consequently preserved its power, its dignity, and its poetry. But to constrain it, as a crowd of composers do to-day, to howl out in a credo brutal phrases, less worthy of the sacred temple than of a tavern, to sound as for the entry of Alexander into Babylon, when there is only question of a dancer's pirouette, to strum chords of the tonic and dominant for a little song which a guitar would suffice to accompany, to mingle its Olympian voice in the poverty-stricken melody of a vaudeville duet, or the frivolous noise of a contra-dance, to prepare in the tutti of a concerto for the triumphal advent of an oboe or a flute, is to impoverish and degrade a magnificent individuality, to make a slave and buffoon of a hero, to discolorize the orchestra, to render impotent and useless all rational progression of instrumental forces, to undo the past, present, and future of art, to commit a voluntary act of vandalism, or show a want of sentiment and expression that approaches to stupidity." This has more direct reference to the abuse of the trombone in writing for full orchestra, but applies with double force to our small theatre orchestras, where the ridiculously small proportion of strings and reeds gives additional prominence to the brass. But bad as this arrangement of orchestral forces is, many not altogether bad efforts might be drawn from it, were the music performed only well arranged for the number and quality of the instruments employed. This however, is rarely the case. The music performed is generally written for full orchestra, which means an orchestra capable of filling at least eighteen and often twenty-four instrumental parts. When such music is played by only twelve or fourteen instruments, it may well be asked, What becomes of the remaining parts? The answer is simple: They must shift for themselves, and the piece do without them as best it can. In some cases music composed for full orchestra, such as light overtures, potpourris, dance music, etc., is published with a view to being performed by a smaller number of instruments than it was originally written for, and some arrangement has been made by which one instrument can take the place of another when absolutely necessary. But these "arrangements for a small orchestra" are very rarely well done; the only object seeming to be to prevent an awkward silence in the middle of a piece where the absence of some solo instrument would leave a disconcerting gap, little or no attention being paid to restoring the dynamic balance of the harmony which the absence of so many instruments from the orchestra must unavoidably destroy. Exceptional combinations of instruments, which our theatre orchestras most certainly are in the history of orchestration, require exceptional treatment, and where instruments have double duty to do, they cannot be treated as if they were only filling their normal place in the orchestra.

But we have dwelt long enough upon this side of the question, and are in truth rather sick of fault finding. In spite of the many and great imperfections of our theatre orchestras, we can see even now indications of how great improvements could be made in them with very little trouble, and how the musical part of theatrical entertainments might be made no despicable agent in improving the popular taste in music, instead of being as they now are a mere drag on popular musical education. And here let no enthusiast for "popular music" imagine for a moment that we would preach the playing of Beethoven symphonies, Bach fugues, or Haydn quartets between the acts at our theatre. We are always glad to hear Strauss waltzes and some of the better class of polkas and mazurkas, many of which can be easily brought within the executive scope of a few instruments. Operatic potpourris we would heartily protest against, as being in the first place an insult to the composer of the opera, and secondly as being perhaps the lowest conceivable form of music, if that can be called a form which has no form or logical development whatever. We have called the operatic potpourri the lowest musical form, but we had almost forgotten those most hideous agglomerations of tunes known as the "medley of popular airs" and the "burlesque overture." The two forms of composition are really one and the same, differing only in name, and are in fact nothing more than the vulgarst popular airs, such as we hear whistled in our streets by hoochblacks and newspaper boys, thrown together without rhyme or reason, and most villainously put upon the orchestra. Far better than these are the German "bouquets of melodies," Conrad's "Melodienbüsche," for instance, which are keenly enjoyable even by cultivated musicians. These "bouquets" consists of bits of different melodies, often not more than four or five bars of each one, thrown together pell-mell, and following upon each other's heels in such quick succession that it often requires the closest attention on the part of the listener to detect where one air changes to another. Thus little bits from operas, symphonies, oratorios, national airs, waltzes, sentimental ballads, and Scotch hornpipes are reeled off before the audience in most bewildering confusion and often with irresistibly comic effect. The "bouquet" arranger has of course an eye to the most glaring and ridiculous contrasts in these sudden changes of theme, and the way in which one air merges into another is at times quite startling. We have heard Handel's Lascia ch'io pianga followed so closely by Ardit's Il Bacio that it was impossible to tell where the one stopped and the other began. Of course these things have no more form than the potpourri, but they are written with manifestly comic intent, and we would no more quarrel with their formlessness than with Artemas Ward's spelling or Hans Breitmann's grammar. That musical wit and humor should be so well appreciated as it actually is by the mass of our audiences is in itself a hopeful sign for the future. Comic variations on any well-known theme are always keenly enjoyed whenever heard. Those astounding bits of musical humor where the piccolo, flute and trombone play a theme in alternate bars, where an air is tossed about all over the orchestra from the first violin to the kettle-drums, where the man with the clarinet "quacks" up from a low note to a high one in most sea-sick portamento, and the double bass squeaks in high harmonics, to be answered by an angry growl from the depths of the bassoon,—are cheap means, perhaps, from any high artistic point of view, for raising a laugh, but more grateful to our ears than cornet cavatinas, badly arranged overtures, or vulgar dance hall music.

When the play performed is of such a nature as to make things of this sort out of place between the acts, the question what to play becomes one of very serious difficulty. Light music of any kind is out of place between the acts of Shakespeare tragedies or in fact of any serious plays, and we shudder at the thought of confiding any really fine music to many of our theatre orchestras. Some of them, to be sure, are capable of producing fine compositions of the simpler sort in quite a passable manner, and they have this advantage over most of the orchestras at our classical concerts, that they are accustomed to play together seven or eight times a week. In some cases it is only a deficiency in numbers that prevents them from being quite good and effective orchestras. The only way that we can see out of the difficulty is, that whatever good music they are called upon to play should be arranged by a competent musician especially for the instruments at his command, with a view to combining those instruments to the best advantage.

Anton Rubinstein.

The following sketch of Rubinstein is the work of an eminent German critic and writer upon dramatic subjects. This English version has been prepared for the Advertiser by a gentleman of great culture and of marked skill as a translator.

Anton Rubinstein was born in the village of Wschewyetz in Russian Bes-Arabia on the 30th of November (18th O. S.) in the year 1830. Early in life he exhibited marked musical talent, and at the age of six years he was placed under Villoing for instruction. In 1840 he went with his teacher to Paris; but failing, on account of his foreign birth, to secure his admission to the Conservatoire, then under the leadership of Cherubini, Villoing had recourse to the bold measure of introducing the young pianist to the Parisian public in the concert room; this at a time, too, when the public had the opportunity of hearing Chopin, Thalberg and other celebrities, and when Franz Liszt was there in the zenith of his fame. But the bold venture proved a most brilliant success. At once favorably impressed by his Beethoven-like head and the grave, mature dignity of his bearing, the audience followed him with rapt attention, and when Liszt first nodded his head approvingly and finally caught up the little fellow in his arms and, kissing him, joyfully exclaimed "Das wird der Erbe meines Spieles," the enthusiasm of the public broke forth in a thunder-storm of applause and the name of Rubinstein was established.

After spending a year and a half in Paris, engaged in the comprehensive study of music, he went to London, where he made the acquaintance and won the regard of Mendelssohn. His youth induced his father to call him home for a time, but in 1844 he was placed under the instruction of "Old Dehn," the celebrated contrapuntist in Berlin. While studying thorough-bass under Dehn, he enjoyed the society of Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer, both of whom took an earnest interest in him and endeavored with kindly sympathy to confine the rushing and unbridled talent of the young son of the Steppes within moderated and regulated bounds. This double influence was most beneficial to Rubinstein's genius. The wild grandeur of his "Asiatic" nature, that involuntarily struggled to break through, found under the wise moderation of "Old Dehn" the path to truth, and, assisted by the fine discrimination of Mendelssohn, the path to beauty.

A sonata for piano and violoncello (the manuscript of which was lost by Dehn) and a series of songs and piano morceaux published in this period, testify to the chastened taste of the young composer.

Upon his father's death in 1846, young Rubinstein, now 17 years of age, was left to his own resources. He formed the plan of going to America, but first sought counsel of his old master, Dehn, who strongly dissuaded him from his purpose, and induced him to remain in Berlin, where he gave instruction on the piano until 1849, and composed his first notable works. The six "Songs of the People," after texts of Löwenstein, are still reckoned among his most original compositions. Much that was written during these years in a feverish impulse, Rubinstein subsequently recast, or, with the severe self-criticism peculiar to himself, condemned and destroyed. From this period, however, date the charming "Persische Lieder" (Persian Songs), and his two important piano concertos. A singular adventure overtook him soon after, when on a journey home to see his mother. His pass, together with many manuscripts, all contained in his trunk, were lost with it, and the Russian police sent the suspected stranger to St. Petersburg under a strong escort, and from there conducted him—though not to Siberia—yet to a fortress or some similar undesirable locality to which lawless individuals are sent in Russia. The romantic expedient which Salvatore Rosa had successfully used with the Italian brigands, and which Donizetti after him is said to have repeated in improvising "Elisir d'amore" to establish his identity, failed with the Russian police, who, although Rubinstein offered to prove his identity upon the piano, remained stolidly immovable. At last the Grand Duchess Helene happened to hear of his adventure, and, effecting his release, the noble, art-loving lady sought to draw him to the musical circles of her court, and permanently attached him to it as chamber virtuoso. Here he had opportunities for a three fold development. As pianist he shone in the courts and public concerts. The imperial government had never (as has been erroneously stated by biography) given him an opportunity to show himself as a director. But he founded a conservatory in St. Petersburg in combination with an institute for larger orchestral renderings, at the head of which he stood for nine years, a service which merits the undying gratitude of his native country. He now found occasion to study and penetrate into the very soul of the great classic symphonies and oratorios of the masters, in the artistic production of which he is now hardly excelled by any living director.

His most important achievements, however, were as a composer. A national Russian opera, "Dmitri Donski," was brought out in 1850, and three lesser operas, "Die Sibirischen Jäger" (the Siberian Hunters), "Toms, der Narr" (Toms the Fool), and "Die Rache" (Revenge) were produced in the two succeeding years. The mighty piano sonata, op. 41, the sonata for piano and cello, and the Ocean Symphony, with its first movement of unsurpassed grandeur, all date from this period. His excellent string quartets, op. 47, the superb trios in G-flat and B sharp,* and several collections of most charming "Klavierstücke" and songs that soon formed with Schubert's and Schumann's song compositions an inestimable treasure of the entire musical world, followed each other in rapid succession. His oratorio, "Das verlor'ne Paradies" (Paradise Lost), that records, though in the most independent manner, his sympathy with Mendelssohn, places him in this field also with the foremost of his predecessors. His great opera, "Die Kinder der Heide" (The Children of the Heath), produced in a masterly manner at the court opera in Vienna, was enthusiastically received. A second German opera "Feramor" (the material from "Lalla Rookh") met with high appreciation at the court theatre in Dresden and in other German theatres. His musical character sketches, "Faust" and "Iwan der Cruel," his quartet for piano and three-string instruments and his oratorio "Der Thurm von Babel" (The building of the tower of Babel) have more recently fully established his reputation. At present he is at work upon a biblical opera, "Moses," and upon one of a romantic, fantastical character, the materials for which are taken from Sermentof's "Demon."

His stay in St. Petersburg suffered but one interruption, in 1854, when he made a concert tour through Germany, England and France, which was one unbroken triumph.

Celebrated as an artist, and satisfied by the flourishing success of the conservatory founded by him, he yet felt that in St. Petersburg he was too far removed from the focus of artist life and action, and he therefore determined upon removing either to Paris or Vienna. The events of the year 1870 decided him to take his family to Vienna, where he accepted the honorable post of director of the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde" (Association of the Friends of Music.)

Rubinstein, as stated above, is 41 years old, but his appearance does not indicate his age. His lithe, elastic body bears a head with a massive brow, crowned with luxuriant hair. Although the somewhat depressed nose and the comparatively small eyes proclaim the Russian type, the head, especially in moments when as conductor or at the piano every nerve of his countenance plays with inspiration and enthusiasm, reminds decidedly of Beethoven. But it is by no means to be supposed that Rubinstein is one of those nervous, fidgety artists who wear the expression of their agitation and enthusiasm purposely or inconsiderately on the surface in order to make a theatrical impression on their audience. Nothing is farther from the character of Rubinstein and more abhorrent to him than outward show. On the contrary he carries his severe simplicity and freedom from all affectation so far, looking only to the just interpretation of the work he may be playing or conducting, that he has repeatedly been accused of puritanical severity.

But it is this very unadorned genuineness and unpretending simplicity which is the leading trait of his character, and by which he regulates his whole life. Although a gentleman in the fullest sense of the word, he and his house, which is always open to the highest and most cultivated society, are of the simplest, most unassuming modesty, and his manner in every exigency of his life shows a modest adaptation to the situation and a total absence of personal vanity—yet combined with the most determined self-reliance and the most utter sinking himself in his task—qualities that contrast favorably with the well-known pretentious manner of many "artists." But while he shows the most amiable affability with his colleagues and with young artists and amateurs, he delights in treating the so-called "great" in society with sovereign artist pride. Wholly insensible to all external marks of honor, titles, orders and flattering praises, he nevertheless demands with iron determination the proper respect and attention due to a true artist. It is well known that he abruptly cut short a piano recital at the Russian court, when the conversation of their highnesses interrupted; and to a northern potentate, who played whilst Rubinstein performed, and who sent him a decoration on the next day, he returned it with the message that he could not have merited it, since Serenissimus had not listened to him at all. The personal apology of the sovereign was tendered upon the succeeding day.

He delights in receiving friends in his own house, which, however often he may change his residence, at once becomes the centre of attraction and gathering-point of all music lovers. His wife, the daughter of a Russian counsellor of state, Tchikonanoff by name, who has presented him with three charming children during the six years of their married life, stands worthily by his side as most amiable of hostesses and highly cultivated art-connoisseurs. She accompanies him to the scene of his new triumphs.

Of his piano playing it is difficult to speak adequately. Moscheles in his day was lauded as the founder of a new school of piano technique. From his school date the energetic attack—the "volubility" of the fingers, the conquest of technical difficulties—in short, the whole dazzling apparatus by means of which so many pianists have attained to universal celebrity. In Rubinstein everything that manual technique can present is concentrated. There are no difficulties for his fingers; he even invents difficulties never dreamed of, in order to conquer them in his playing, and some of his compositions can therefore be played adequately by no one but himself. When Thalberg held his triumphal march, it was the elegance and grace of his delivery which entranced the whole world. Under his aristocratic fingers the keys gave forth melodies like song. Now hear Rubinstein sing Chopin or play Rossini's Gondolier, and you seem to hear the magic of the song itself accompanied by the softly tremulous chords of the mandoline. One is led to expect his titanic strength from his mighty hands and his massive head: and it is in the massive, the grand, one might say the symphonic of piano playing that Rubinstein has found his true domain. Beethoven rushes forth from under his fingers like a gigantic torrent, a piano sonata becomes a symphony, a symphony played by him on the piano sounds like an orchestral rendering. The listener fancies he sees a Briareus with one hundred hands, for the forte rises above itself and mounts to an overpowering volume of sound. Yet each phrase is clear and intelligently expressive, and there is an affinity between the great tone-poet and his interpreter, who bodies forth thoughts not dreamt of in the interpretation of others.

Here Rubinstein is aided by an almost fabulous memory, playing the entire classic repertoire from recollection, and his recitals thus seem like improvisation. Then when you hear him accompany some song of Schubert or Schumann you will ask yourself in amazement whether it be the singer or the accompanist who sings. It is this unbounded versatility of his genius, furnishing perfection in every requirement, that has made him sole monarch in the realm of the pianoforte. A concert of Rubinstein's needs no other artist's assistance, no other numbers. The charm of variety in his rendering has made it possible for him to give unaided and alone four concerts in one season that filled the vast Concert Halle in Vienna to the dome. Yet though no numbers but his own were on the programme his audiences were never weary and never satisfied, demanding encores at the close of each concert with perfect storms of applause.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER.—The Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian is responsible for the following: "The celebrated pianist, Leopold de Meyer, gives his experience at the Turkish Court in a letter, which is going the round of the papers. 'It was,' he says, 'no easy matter to play music in the seraglio. You are sent for at eight in the morning in order to play at three in the afternoon; you must be in full uniform; you wait seven hours in a very fine gallery, where it is forbidden to sit. From time to time you are informed of what his Highness is doing. His Highness has just got up—you must prostrate yourself. A little later you are told that his Highness is taking his bath—you prostrate yourself again. His Highness is dressing—you re-prostrate yourself. His Highness is taking his coffee, and you re-prostrate yourself at each of these particulars more profoundly than before. At length your piano is brought in. The legs have been taken off so as not to injure the floor, a precious mosaic of rare woods. The immense grand piano is placed on five Turks! The wretched men support the crushing mass on their knees. 'Why,' you say, 'I can't play on a five-Turk piano.' It is thought that you hesitate because the instrument is not horizontal. A cushion is therefore placed under the knees of the smallest Turk. No one supposes that a sentiment of humanity makes you hesitate. After a long explanation of this refinement of civilization, the piano is placed on its own legs again. The Sultan appears. After all sorts of salaams you are told to play. You ask for a chair; there is no chair. No one ever sits in presence of his Highness.' M. de Meyer suppresses one detail which, however, is current here as authentic. He played a long fantasia on his knees, and when, at the end, the Sultan thought he must be very tired, M. de Meyer convinced his Highness of the contrary by moving round the gallery on his hands."

The Star Spangled Banner and National Songs.

[Read at a meeting of the American Antiquarian Society in Worcester, October 21, by the Hon. Stephen Salisbury, President of the Society.]

As a slight cloak of propriety, if not of dignity for a subject that may be considered of little importance, to which I invite the attention of the society for a few minutes, I will offer a familiar quotation from Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, which is of some value to Fletcher, for it has given him his best hold on the memory of modern times. He writes: I know of a very wise man who believed that if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who made all the laws of the nation." If this should be thought to be exaggeration, it will not be doubted that national songs, in some degree, form and indicate the character of a people, and are therefore worthy of historical notice. I am not aware that there is more important proof of this power of music than is found in the influence of the song entitled "The Star Spangled Banner," during the struggles for the life of our nation in the last twelve years. In the efforts and suffering of the camp, the battle-field and the prison, and in the discouragements and sacrifices of those who upheld the national arm at home, the untiring repetition of their inspiring strains and the "marching on" of a more humble and more energetic chorus kept up by the strength and enthusiasm of confident hope. Thus the "Star Spangled Banner" has become a favorite of our people. It is well known that it was written by Thomas Scott Key, a young lawyer of Baltimore, in September, 1814, and it was begun on board of a ship of the British fleet lying near Fort M'Henry, to which he had gone to negotiate an exchange of prisoners. To prevent his giving intelligence to his countrymen of the intention to make the combined attack by sea and by land on Baltimore, he was detained as a prisoner of war. There he anxiously watched the flag of his country floating over the fort through the day, and in the darkness of the night caught occasional glimpses of it, in the explosion of the shells and rockets by which it was assailed, and when morning dawned, he saw with thrilling delight, that the beautiful ensign still waved over its brave defenders. This scene and the emotions that it excited he has painted and expressed in this pathetic and inspiring song. The origin of the appropriate tune, that gives strength and deeper feeling to the words, is not so well known. Every one can readily say that the tune is taken from the old English song, entitled, "To Anacreon in Heaven." But I have inquired in vain of the most learned belles-lettres scholars that I know or could approach, for the author of the words or the music or the date of either. The song, as printed in "The Universal Songster," published in London, from 1825 to 1834, has the name of Ralph Tomlinson as the author. Multiplied inquiries and research in all biographies and indexes, that I can consult, have not discovered the name, yet the song has grace, beauty and wit, and is enriched with happy classical ornaments, and it seems to be a thing that could not be disowned or forgotten. It existed to be the model of the song by Robert Treat Paine, Jr., called "Adams and Liberty," at the period when Thomas Moore was first known as a poet, and it is almost worthy of his pen, but it has never been attributed to him. It is commonly called an old English song, but the earliest imprint of it that I have seen, is in my copy of "The Vocal Companion," published in Philadelphia, by Mathew Carey, in 1796. The Nightingale, printed in Boston, in 1804, has the words and the music, but not the name of the author. It seems, then, to be a case in which the best of evidence must be obtained from the party on trial, and the song must speak for itself. Its first words are:

"To Anacreon in Heaven, where he sat in full glow,
A few sons of harmony sent their petition," and the last line and the chorus are:—

"May our club flourish happy, united and free;
And long may the sons of Anacreon entwine
The Myrtle of Venus with Bacchus's Vine."

We have here the facts that the song was written for a musical club, called the sons of Anacreon. Of this club I can find no other mention. With a general resemblance to the poetry of Moore, there are sentences that have not his choice English, as for instance, the line above, "May our club flourish happy, united and free," which is more like the language of the republican contemporaries of Robert Treat Paine, than the verses of the wits of the earlier time of the first George, or of Queen Anne, to whom the song has vaguely been attributed.

The Historical Magazine, vol. 3, p. 23, states that the tune was originally set to the song, "To Anacreon in Heaven," by Dr. Arnold. Many notices of Dr. Samuel Arnold, who lived from 1739 to 1802, do not support this statement, though they mention inferior music. This accompaniment is more remarkable than the poetry. Its character is strong and decided, yet it is graceful and flexible, and adapts itself with equal success to the sport of the revellers, to the anxious thoughts of the patriot prisoner and to the exulting tones of national strength.

As an apology for this research of much length and little fruit, it may be remembered that the investigation of authorship of subjects of intellectual entertainment is not a waste of time for idle curiosity. The enjoyment of the works of our greatest favorites is increased by a sense of personal gratitude.

The song to Anacreon is always admired on first acquaintance, but it has not gained a place among verses which make men stronger and happier in remembering them. Though it is free from grossness, it is a bacchanalian song, and, like the subject, it must be a transient pleasure at the best. It is said that, in the first flush of popularity, its rhythm and music were used for poetical efforts more short lived than itself. I do not discover that it was a favorite when Robert Treat Paine, Jr., used its measure in his spirited song, entitled "Adams and Liberty," which was written for and first sung at the anniversary of the Massachusetts charitable fire society in Boston, on June 1, 1798.

Its first words:—

"Ye sons of Columbia, who bravely have fought
For those rights, which unsal'd from your shores have descended;

And the energetic chorus—

"For the sons of Columbia will never be slaves,
While the earth bears a plant or the sea rolls its waves—

Will bring to mind its high sentiments and swelling sound, well suited for musical expression and enthusiastic effect. Though it was brought out in a time of great party bitterness, and it was exclusively claimed by one of the parties, it has nothing but the language of the broadest patriotism. With all its merits, it was never universally accepted as a national song, and the recent "Library of Poetry and Song," published under the sanction of the honored name of William Cullen Bryant, has rescued from oblivion "Sally in our Alley," but has no room for the sons of Columbia. Some reasons for this failure may be briefly stated. The name of the wise patriot at the head of the government, which was a part of the title of the song, did not recommend it. The broad waves of democracy, which had begun to carry Mr. Jefferson to the highest place, for a time submerged the merits of Mr. Adams and his federal associates, and federal sentiments and federal songs lost their popular pre-eminence. This political movement, though partially unjust, was not wholly evil, since it severed the last rope that bound our nation to the fast-anchored isle from which it had been launched. Moreover, there was a felt, though unacknowledged, incongruity between the chorus and the condition of an increasing portion of our inhabitants, and the thoughts and feelings of the song are peculiar to the recent struggle and the escape from national peril; and the ideas of strength, prosperity and progress are not set forth as they should be in a national song.

After sixteen years, in which the tune of the Anacreontic song was seldom heard in this country or in Europe, it was applied to the pathetic verses of Mr. Key. A few words may be permitted concerning this questioned right to use the rhythm and music for an American song. Notes and Queries (2d. s. v. 6, 429,) quotes from "Amusing Letters from America," this passage. The air of "The Star Spangled Banner," which our cousins, with their customary impudence of assertion, claim as their own, is almost note for note that of the fine old English song "When Vulcan forged the bolts of Jove." That the song, "When Vulcan forged the bolts," &c., written by Thomas Dibdin, "is very little, if at all, older than the Star Spangled Banner," and its verses are not fitted to the same tune, are to an amusing writer facts of no consequence. The quoted passage is a missile that has so often been thrown across the water, that it is worth while to pick it up and examine it for a moment. The English language and its treasures are the property of those who emigrated from the parent country, and of those who remained there. And the emigrants have not been wanting in successful efforts to add something to the common store. When frauds are perpetrated against the individual producer's right to honor or profit, as has occurred on both sides, let the offenders be punished severely, as they will be by shame and loss. But, in this case, there was no fraud and no injury. A musical composition, little regarded, was openly taken up as a neglected stray, and attached to verses with which it was more effective than with the words with which it is first known to us. An advantageous use gives a better right of property than a fruitless discovery or invention. No one reproaches the Protestants of England that they took possession of an obscure French tune, and by a change in its movement adapted it to their taste and their religious comfort and edification, as "Old Hundred."

For a time, the words of the "Star Spangled Banner" were occasionally sung by the cultivated and refined, but they were too sad for the spirit of a strong and ambitious people. But after forty years a cloud of anxiety and peril came over our land, that was faintly shadowed in the night watch of Mr. Key. Then strength and endurance were gladly sought in sympathy with the devoted patriotism and confident hope that he has so strongly expressed. That darkness has now passed, and the music that cheered it will not be heard above the loud and joyful tones of prosperity and ambition. The instrumental accompaniment and the thrilling chorus, worthy of the most beautiful national flag on the earth, will be a constant and untiring gratification to the ear and the heart of an American. But the words now in use will not be accepted as a permanent national song.

The distinction of being the undisputed and most approved American national song is conceded to Hail Columbia, which was written in 1798, by Joseph Hopkinson, LL. D., of Philadelphia, for the benefit of an actor named Fox. The Columbian Centinel of May 2, 1798, on the shelves of your library, gives the verses as we have them, and states that "it has been sung on the boards of Philadelphia." The Historical Magazine, vol. 5, page 282, on authority of William McKoy of Philadelphia, in Poulson's Advertiser of 1829, mentions that this song was set to the music of "The President's March," by Johanne Roth, a German music teacher in that city. And the Historical Magazine, vol. 3, page 23, quotes from the Baltimore Clipper of 1841, that the "President's March" was composed by Professor Phylla, of Philadelphia, and was played at Trenton in 1789, when Washington passed over to New York to be inaugurated, as it was stated by a son of Professor Phylla, who was one of the performers. The thoughts of "Hail Columbia" are elevated and refined, but they are peculiar to the circumstances of its origin. They are directed to the conflict that has just ceased, the efforts necessary to secure its fruits, and the possibility of future peril, with a just tribute to Washington and the other heroes and statesmen on whom the nation relies. With these qualities it has never satisfied the demand for a national patriotic song, and as time goes on, it is called for in the absence of a better, with increasing infrequency.

Yandee Doodle is a national property, but it is not a treasure of the highest value. It has some antiquarian claims, on which its warmest friends do not rely. It cannot be disowned, and it will not be disused. In its own older words,

"It suits for feasts, it suits for fun,
And just as well for fighting."

And its easy utterance and its fearless and frolicsome humor make its accompaniment welcome on fit occasions and preserve its popularity. But it exists now as an instrumental and not as a vocal performance. Its voice is never heard, and I think would not be acceptable to America for public or private entertainments. But its music must be silent when serious purposes are entertained, and men's hearts are moved to high efforts and great sacrifices. As a song, Yankee Doodle has not a national character.

To give an account of the sapphic ode called "The American Hero," written by Hon. and Rev. Nathan Niles, and very popular in Connecticut during the Revolutionary war, and to describe other abortive attempts to furnish a national song, would suit the patience of the study of an antiquary better than the small share that I can claim of this brief session. But I cannot omit to say a few words on the recent efforts to obtain a national song by transplanting the old English anthem God Save the King. The most acceptable of these is the anthem called America, beginning "My country, 'tis of thee," and following the air and metre of its original. The author is the Rev. Dr. Samuel Francis Smith, a professor in Colby University, and an eminent man for learning and character in the distinguished class that graduated from Harvard University in 1829. The anthem has much merit of thought and expression, but when it is sung it excites little enthusiasm, and it is easy to see that it is received with the limited satisfaction with which a man wears a coat that is borrowed and altered. Such imitations will never be recognized as national songs. It is said that the tune of "God Save the King" has been adopted by the present Emperor of Germany for state occasions throughout his dominions. If this be true, the Germans have too much of fatherland to sanction such an adoption. It is more likely that it is sung and played at times there, as in France and this country, for the mere entertainment of the music.

The weight of evidence is in favor of the claims of Henry Carey, Mus. D., who lived from 1692 to 1743, to the authorship of the poetry and music of "God Save the King." Of Mr. Carey, his friend Jean Frederic Lampe said: "His musical instruction did not enable him to put a bass to his own ballads." This noble anthem was made for the honor of George the Second, who otherwise received little honor from his subjects and their posterity. Such is the strange origin of the grandest patriotic song in the English language. We may learn what our American national song should be, by observing what the ancient model is in its various parts. The notes are emphatic as a chant, easily learned and distinctly sounded by many, so that the singers hear and are moved by the voices of their companions; and this effect is aided by the shortness of the words. Though the air is simple, it is fitted to rise with the strength of feeling. It appeals with power to loyalty, which in a monarchy is devotion to the king, his crown and dignity. It is suited to all the changes of national life, to joy or grief, to peace or war, to anxiety or triumph. It has enough of the progressive and aggressive character to gratify the Anglo-Saxon temper and the attractive spice of party spirit is not wanting. And it is pervaded with an expression of religious trust that is more grateful to the mind of man than our philosophers are willing to admit. A patriotic song equally well adapted to our institutions would be an ornament and a strength to our nation, and an untiring enjoyment to our people.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, OCT. 10.—Most of our city papers have announced the fact that it is now a year since the fire. The Almanac confirms their assertion. And as I tried to give you last year some idea of the destruction, I will this year endeavor to give a conception of the restoration. During the year there have been built in the central part of the city a little over ten miles of business fronts, buildings of brick and stone, from four to seven stories high, costing in the aggregate over forty-three millions of dollars. The burnt district of the South side is about half re built. On the North side less has been done. But next year will go far to put them to rights again. At the same time the parts of the city not destroyed have improved faster than ever before in the same time. The national census of 1870 gave us, I think, a trifle under three hundred thousand people. Our own school census of October, '71, gave us about 327,000 people. Our school census of '72, just taken, shows a present population of 367,000. The North Side has about 12,000 less than before the fire. The South Side about 2,000 more; the West Side has now 214,000, or over 50,000 more than a year ago. At the same time all the suburban towns have grown faster than ever before. The Directory for this year gives names enough to imply a population of 400,000, showing that a large proportion of business men live out of town.

In the way of places of amusement we have two new theatres completed and occupied. McVickers's is a much finer building on the old site, and has seats for 1800 people. Aiken's is at the corner of Wabash Avenue and Congress St. (one block south of Van Buren St.), and is a very elegant house with a well arranged stage, and seats numbering 1600. I think Farwell Hall will be rebuilt next year, the need of such a building being very pressing. The new Chamber of Commerce was opened this week. It is of the same dimensions as the old one, but finer, and cost nearly $400,000.

Our musical life is killed out by many "cumbering cares" (as Mr. Watts called them). The Oratorio Society have resumed rehearsals, and intend to produce Costa's "Naaman." We shall have no orchestral doings of our own this year.

Mr. Robert Goldbeck is engaged in a work which I ought to have spoken of before. It is nothing less than the creation of a Conservatory of Music on a broad and liberal basis. In order to get capital he has offered and is disposing of 500 shares or scholarships, of $100 each, good for ten terms of class lessons or five of private instruction. He is meeting with remarkable success in this undertaking. He has bought of Lyon and Healy The Musical Independent (suspended since the fire) and is just bringing out the first number. I may mention that his advertising patronage is large enough to nearly pay the expense of publication. I think you will be pleased with the paper, though not perhaps with all its views, for it has a well-marked and forcible individuality. He will edit it himself.

Last week there was a benefit concert in honor of Mr. Louis Falk, our best concert organist since Mr. Buck's departure. Many prominent amateurs took part and "spread themselves" ambitiously for two hours in the first part of the programme. The second part was interesting, as it contained a very mutilated performance of Mendelssohn's "Athalia." The chorus numbered about sixty admirable voices, and the orchestra about thirty, the whole under Mr. Butterfield's directing. Mr. Falk himself played Schumann's BACH Fugue, and a Potpourri of Meyerbeer's airs. I am watching Mr. Falk's course with very great interest, for he is a young man of remarkable talent, a fine organist and pianist (though rather heavy in the latter relation), and a good teacher. If he has the nerve to stand against the popular current which sets against the true and legitimate in music, his career will be a brilliant and useful one.

And this brings me to the best thing I have to say. Namely, that Theo. Thomas and his orchestra are here, and your Mr. Osgood. The programmes are better than he has given us before. We have, for instance, two entire symphonies, Beethoven's 7th and Schumann's in B flat, and two of Liszt's Symphonic Poems, besides movements from other Symphonies, and a variety of important Overtures. The violins number fifteen, and with Listemann at the head why shouldn't they play well?

The concerts are given in Aiken's Theatre, which has been filled. The playing seems to me even better than it was formerly. Certainly it is good enough for us. Then, too, I am especially interested in the work Mr. Osgood is doing in familiarizing our public with those beautiful Schubert, Schumann and Franz songs. No one has ever sung them here before, and of course our audiences hardly know what to make of them. But it is easy to see that the idea gains favor, and I have hopes of Chicago yet. The city press might have done better to assist the cause had some paper happened to have thought it worth while. We need here very much some weekly paper of literary and artistic authority, or else more competent attention to these things in the daily press.

We look for Rubinstein early in December, and expect to be astonished and delighted. Thomas gave us the Adagio and Scherzo from Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony. It was very much admired by connoisseurs. It seemed to me more truly beautiful than any of the other music of the future I have heard. Possibly more hearing might change this opinion. The Schumann Symphony is certainly the real thing—something new and lovely.

But I trespass on your space.

Italian Opera in New York. Pauline Lucca, as Marguerite, in Faust.

NEW YORK, OCT. 28.—Up to the present time, the management at the Italian Opera has done little to redeem the fair promises made at the opening of the season. Since my last letter only two additions (Don Giovanni and "Trovatore") have been made to the repertoire, and, but for the genius of Pauline Lucca, the popularity of Miss Kellogg, and the excellent singing and acting of M. Jamet, both of these representations would have fallen below mediocrity. Advantage has been taken of these three names to bring before the public a company of singers which could obtain a hearing in no other way, not even I believe at the Stadt Theatre in the Bowery.

The scenery and costumes give evidence of that "economy" which is penny-wise and pound foolish; and the same spirit has, in many cases, been evinced in dealing with the press. As a natural result some of the papers have taken to telling the truth, and the management, having thus caught an extremely unpleasant Tartar, fills the columns of its programme with long-winded vindications of itself and its policy, quite forgetting the French proverb: "Qui s'accuse s'accuse."

In spite of these unfavorable surroundings, Mme. Pauline Lucca is constantly increasing in public favor, and it is evident that the task of preserving the enterprise from utter failure rests mainly upon her. Of the four impersonations in which she has appeared, the most dramatic and, as a whole, the most satisfactory is that of Marguerite in Faust. I state this in face of the fact that her conception of the character is in many respects directly the opposite of Miss Nilsson's; the one being intensely realistic, while the other is purely ideal. There is a feeling of disappointment when, in the first act, we look for the exquisite vision of Ary Scheffer and behold only Gretchen at the wheel. This feeling returns in the second act at the meeting between Faust and Marguerite. Remembering the gentleness, the calmness with which Nilsson rendered that lovely fragment of melody: "No, Signor, io non son damigella né bella," we are unprepared for Lucca's touch of coquetry, although her somewhat scornful attitude is quite in keeping with the words she is singing. It is plainly Goethe's Gretchen and not the ideal Marguerite which she aims to reproduce, and in the third act all prejudice is forgotten, and the real merit and genius of the singer are unquestioned. She sings "The King of Thule" absently, as though she were far more intent upon her own thoughts than upon the meaning of her song; and in the Jewel scene she attempts to delineate nothing more complex than the delight of a simple peasant girl at such a trouvaille. It is in the Duet with Faust, and the subsequent love scene that her true greatness is best revealed. The charm lies quite as much in her acting as in her singing, and both are admirable.

The death of Valentine in the fourth act presents a curious anomaly, his agony and rage are so very stagey, so plainly assumed; while the anguish, the sorrow past bearing of his sister, is so painfully real. In the church scene Mme. Lucca departs widely from her predecessors. Instead of a lonely chapel, the nave of a great cathedral is disclosed, filled with worshippers who kneel before the high altar. The organ peals solemnly; slowly and with faltering footsteps Marguerite enters the church and advances towards the throng of worshippers; she sees their scornful glances; sees them draw back at her approach, shrieking from the touch of her garments as from contamination, and, meekly accepting the ban, takes her place in the nave alone, far from the altar, and tries to pray. Then, in a niche near by, behind the figure of a saint, the spirit of evil appears dimly outlined, and as he utters his terrible curse, the poor girl cowers before him as though she would shrink into the earth. Still she tries to pray, turning the leaves of her prayer-book with nervous haste and trembling fingers, until at last the book drops from her nerveless hand, she starts to her feet, confronts the demon and falls senseless to the floor.

In the short but trying Prison scene her acting and singing are fully up to the requirements of the situation, and her impersonation of Marguerite must be regarded as among the best that our Academy has ever known.

M. Jamet is thoroughly identified with the rôle of Mephistopheles, and I need hardly say that he is greatly to be admired both as a singer and an actor, but the other rôles were too badly filled to deserve mention.

Three more Rubinstein concerts took place here last week. In the first (Thursday evening) Rubinstein played: the Chromatic Fantasia by Bach, Etudes by Chopin, and the "Kreutzer" Sonata with Wieniawski. The latter played Bach's Chaconne (for Violin alone) and his own Fantasia. Mlle. Liebhart sang "Angels ever bright and fair," and two little songs by Pinsuti and Kücken. Mlle. Ormeny was down for an Aria by Stradella and "Il Segreto" from Lucresia Borgia.

On Friday evening Rubinstein played: Air and Variations by Handel, followed by the "Cat Fugue" and Sonata of Scarlatti; Mendelssohn's Variations Series; some Etudes of his own; and, with the violinist, the Rondo in F minor by Schubert. The Violin Solos were: Elegie, by Ernst; Polonaise, by Wieniawski; Aria, by Bach and Rondo by Vieuxtemps. Mlle. Ormeny sang Romeo's Aria, by Bellini; and Mlle. Liebhart a new song, "Meeting," composed for her by H. Millard.

At the Saturday Matinée, the great pianist gave Studies for the Pedal Piano by Schumann, besides opening the concert with Preludes by himself, and closing it with "Kamenetschtoff," No. 7, and an Impromptu, both of them his own. Wieniawski played a transcribed Romance of Rubinstein's, besides a Rondo, an "Air Ture," "Airs Russes," and Mazurka, No. 3, all of his own composition. The Soprano lady sang "Fedra Carino" and an old English ballad; and the Contralto an Aria from Concettola and a Hungarian song: "Es a Villag."

At the first concert Mlle. Ormeny was unable to appear, and Rubinstein was her welcome substitute, playing in addition to the pieces set down in the programme, a Song without Words by Mendelssohn, a Romance by Schumann, a Nocturne by John Field and Schubert's Erl King, (Liszt).

This week the great pianist is to play in Philadelphia.

Rubinstein and Wieniawski.

The last three of the five concerts of that most exciting musical week (Oct. 14th to 19th) differed from the first two in being without Orchestra. No more full Concertos, therefore, either for pianoforte or for violin. In fact concerts of (mostly classical) chamber music given in the great Hall of Symphony and Oratorio! And herein we note one of the wonders of Rubinstein's phenomenal and sovereign power as a pianist: He could make the finest and the deepest music ever written for the instrument—works by Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin—clearly heard, felt, appreciated throughout that great hall! Never in the selectest circle of a chamber concert have we perceived a more complete, absorbed attention than was given by that whole audience, not only, to the grandiose and fiery A-flat Polonaise of Chopin, but quite as much to the "Moonlight Sonata," and (most remarkable of all, unparalleled in our experience of audiences) to one of the most profoundly spiritual and subtly intellectual among Beethoven's Sonatas, the last of all, op. 111. Even that most difficult, strange work, so seldom ventured upon in public or in private, and for which you would hardly expect at any time more than a dozen listeners who could follow it throughout, was so presented by this masterly interpreter,—or rather through this perfect "medium," as to hold the whole assembly spell-bound to the end apparently. In that Sonata and, previously, in the Etudes Symphoniques of Schumann we think we felt his extraordinary power of identifying himself with the rarest inspirations of the great composers, and giving them clear, audible, complete expression, the most sensibly. It was at least proved that mere Pianoforte music can be made appreciable, can be brought fairly home to one in the Boston Music Hall, although of course a smaller room is better.

—But now to take things in their order. The Matinée of Wednesday afternoon brought great increase of audience, and was an occasion so electrifying that one shrinks in anticipation from the exhaustion very sure to follow upon two or three repetitions of such a draft on one's emotional and nervous energies, as only listening and enjoying so intensely for a few hours must involve. Such listening cannot be passive. What must the expenditure of nervous force be, then, in the performer!—Rubinstein opened the concert with his own transcription of the Overture to Egmont, very broad and full, even orchestral in its effect, and keeping up the tempo and the noble rhythm with such a buoyant and untrammelled continuity and freedom, that it seemed wholly self-sustaining, lifted up into the air, never needing once to touch the earth, like earth-born giants, to renew its strength. Then followed, under the vague announcement of "Sonata," the dreamy and poetic "Moonlight," the love poem of Beethoven, so impassioned, uncontrollable in its Finale. It was in sooth a wonderfully perfect and poetic rendering, and though we did not sit in intimate seclusion in the twilight hour, even out there in the crowd and the great light hall, the real spell came over most of us. It was a satisfaction to hear the tempi of the several movements so rightly taken; most players make the Scherzo so fast, that it loses all relation to the Adagio that precedes it.

After Mlle. ORMENY had sung Handel's "Lascia ch'io pianga,"—not as we have heard it!—and Herr WIENIAWSKI had displayed his admirable art as a violinist in the Air Varié of Vieuxtemps,—and Mlle. LIEBHART had sung a couple of Lieder (Mendelssohn's "Von all schönen Kindern" and Schumann's "Du meine Seele"), Herr Rubinstein came again to the piano (the finest "Steinway," by the way, that we have yet heard) and played as usual a group of three pieces all by Chopin: first the remarkable Nocturne in C minor (op. 48); then the lovely Berceuse, which never sang itself so limpidly and sweetly upon any instrument before, and finally an unfamiliar Etude, in which there is such a startling rush and energy of bold bravura (at least as he smote it out as from a rock), that for the time we fancied it to be a thing of Liszt's or of his own.

Part Second opened with a couple of rather commonplace songs by the Soprano ("I love, my love," by Pinsuti, and "Guten Morgen" by Jubilee Abt). Then Rubinstein gave, what is so very seldom heard here in the concert room, one of Weber's Sonatas, a piece severely taxing execution, full of the Weber fire and individuality, at times wearying you, perhaps, by its no end of brilliancy (like one of our torch-light processions), but ending with a charming Rondo. Of course all there was in it was brought out in the very best light, and it gave a good full glance into the wealth of Weber's too much neglected larger pianoforte compositions, for which the curious music lover should be thankful. Mlle. Ormeny sang a fine old air by Pergolesi: "Tre giorni son che Nina," in a style hardly worthy of its beauty. One of the purest and sweetest moments in these concerts was Wieniawski's playing, as an unaccompanied violin solo, of the lovely, soulful Aria from Bach's Orchestral Suite in D. It went deeply to the heart of every hearer. A brilliant "Capriccio Waltz" of his own followed it. Rubinstein, for a concluding group, gave three short pieces of his own—a Romance, a Barcarole and Valse Caprice, all interesting.

Of Friday evening's concert the two great features were the exquisitely perfect rendering by the two men of the "Kreutzer Sonata," which seemed to unfold a new wealth of meaning and of beauty, and Rubinstein's playing of the whole series of Schumann's Kreideriana, which, enigmatical as much of the music is to many, yet must have had a strange charm for all. One wants to hear all these things when such an artist comes along for once with all the power to show us what they are, and we cannot be too grateful to this Russian man of genius, possessing all the means and all the will, for bringing forth so freely for us out of stores sealed to most of us. Already, of Schumann alone, the Etudes Symphoniques, the Carnival, the Kreideriana! For the first group of smaller pieces Rubinstein played really what we, trusting to the printed programmes rather than to our own memory, have just been ascribing to the Wednesday matinee; whereas we are quite sure (we write a week after) that he played then what was set down for Friday, namely: several Songs without Words by Mendelssohn and the Chopin Ballade in G minor, fully illustrating the individuality of each. For the concluding group he played a Barcarole, a Meodie, and an Etude of his own,—the last being the piece which we have heard under the absurd title of False Infernale "on false notes," though there is nothing false in an accent falling on an appoggiatura or fore-note, instead of that into which it at once leads.

Wieniawski's solo rôle that evening was mainly on the virtuoso ("Paganini") side; his selections being Ernst's Fantasia on Il Pirata and the "Carnival of Venice," which he makes as marvellous and as full of exquisite surprises as anybody, without forsaking art for vulgar clap-trap; yet we would rather hear him do anything else which he is wont to do. He did, however, (we think it was that evening), respond to a recall by playing his own tender and poetic "Legende" once more; only one missed the fine orchestration.—Mlle. Ormeny, in much better tune this time, sang "Una voce" with a good deal of florid execution, and we forget what else. Mlle. Liebhart too sang "Angels ever bright and fair" with good voice and expression.

The enthusiasm reached a second climax in the final Matinée on Saturday (19th), when the following programme was performed:

Sonata.....	Anton Rubinstein.
.....	Anton Rubinstein and Henri Wieniawski.
Hungarian Song, "Eva Villag."	Mlle. Louise Ormeny.
Chaconne, for the Violin.....	Bach.
.....	Henri Wieniawski.
"Fedra Carino".....	Momart.
.....	Mlle. Louise Liebhart.
a. Nocturne.....	Chopin.
b. Mazurka.....	Chopin.
c. Polonaise, in A flat.....	Chopin.
.....	Anton Rubinstein.
{ "Robin Adair."	Mlle. Louise Liebhart
{ "Ruck, Ruck."	Mlle. Louise Liebhart
Sonata, Opus 111.....	Beethoven.
.....	Anton Rubinstein.
"La Falletta".....	Mlle. Louise Ormeny.
{ a. Romance in F.....	Beethoven.
{ b. Airs Russes.....	Wieniawski.
.....	Henri Wieniawski.
Suite. { Sarabande—Passe-Pied,	Anton Rubinstein.
Concerto—Gavotte.....	Anton Rubinstein.

The two memorable features of this concert were the great Chaconne of Bach, played, as originally written, without accompaniment, (for indeed it contains all in itself), and with by far more power and breadth, more fullness and more fineness of interpretation, than we ever heard it before by any one except Joachim (that was a dozen years ago, so that we will not venture on comparison; and it was not in the big Music Hall, but in a hotel chamber before an audience of one!); and that last of the wonderful series of Beethoven's Sonatas, in C minor, so deep and almost mystical in meaning, with its fitful and impassioned introduction and Allegro, and all the rest consisting in the marvellously subtle, seemingly exhaustless variation of that singing Adagio (Arietta molto semplice Cantabile, in dotted eighths, nine-sixteens measure). For the first time we felt that we had truly heard it. As we have said before, the whole great audience heard it, listened oblivious of all else, whether they understood it all or not. In this sense the achievement was almost unprecedented in a concert room. More than that, we know not when a piece of music has moved us so deeply. There was something holy in the tones which he brought out; sometimes they seemed to answer from another world, like a transfiguration of the theme or phrase once struck. Let us not despair now of any real inspiration from however deep a source, however complex and thick-set with difficulties in its development,—of any utmost reach of any Bach's or Beethoven's imagination and profoundest science, being communicable to any real music-lover. It strikes us, men like Rubinstein are sent into the world to show us that all this is possible, and prove to us, through our own feeling,—cords set thrilling in a deeper deep within us than we had before suspected,—that the last Sonatas of Beethoven are not the helpless wanderings of a brain diseased, but are divinely beautiful and full of meaning worth the searching for.

The specimens presented of Rubinstein's own compositions were very interesting. We unfortunately lost most of the opening movement of the Sonata Duo, but we heard enough to convince us that it is worth hearing more than once, and is by no means the production of an ordinary man. The four movements of the Suite,—particularly the Sarabande, were fresh and genial, with a sufficient flavor of the antique quaintness, and furnished very agreeable proof of the great versatility of the composer.

The little Violin Romanza, in Beethoven's earlier style, is always pleasing, and of course doubly so when played by Wieniawski; but we would rather not have heard it then, nor anything else, unless it were some wholesome, tranquillizing bit of Bach, right after such a Beethoven Sonata! Both the singers gained upon their audience that day.

The visit of these two great artists is an event in the musical history of Boston. Nothing that may occur this season, or perhaps in several seasons, will eclipse it. Our public has been electrified, and deeply moved. The power of genius, personally manifested, has been realized as not before. We have had more insight into the possibilities of music and acquired a new respect for its accomplishments. And the return of RUBINSTEIN and WIENIAWSKI,—we understand that we may look for them at Christmas time—will be hailed with genuine enthusiasm; for the more such artists are heard, and in such music as such artists choose, the stronger is the desire to hear them.

MR. A. P. PECK'S CONCERTS claim our hearty recognition, if only for the reason that they have successfully set the example in miscellaneous concerts, which it was much easier to establish in the Harvard Symphony Concerts, of no encores. The special notice at the head of the programmes was resolutely carried out, and on the whole cheerfully acquiesced in by an audience largely made up of the partial friends of each of the several artists. Every newspaper of any character endorsed the policy the next day. So let us hope that henceforth "no encores" will be the rule, accepted by an instinct of propriety, and that repetitions shall be so rare as to be exceptional. We do not wish the prohibition in the long run to be absolute; but perhaps it had better remain so while the spoiled child is still too weak in self-control to be indulged in those exceptional liberties which sometimes may be quite legitimate and safe. If only abstinence will lead to temperance, we go for abstinence for the time being.

But this was not the only merit of these concerts. The spirit which dictated that "special notice," naturally shows itself again in the uncommonly (for miscellaneous popular concerts) well selected programmes. Mr. Peck has found out what pleases people of some real musical taste, that there in the long run, more and more, do give the tone to concert audiences, and that the day for catering to no taste; at the risk of boring or disgusting all who have at least some taste, has gone by; and he has earned the reputation of arranging about the best miscellaneous popular concerts that we have. The elements, however, were against him this time. The Presidential Election, and the oppressive vague presentiment of too much in the way of music and all sorts of entertainments, have made the sale of tickets dull for every sort of concert so far, even affecting those of Rubinstein. Added to this, bad weather and our sudden deprivation of horse power, came in, not only to reduce the audience, but to render it impossible for Mr. Peck to give more than two of the four concerts advertised. The last two he has prudently postponed a month. Already in the second one, the Matinée of Saturday, Miss MARCUS, who had played the evening before, still in the city, could find no conveyance to the Music Hall. Why will not Mr. Gilmore convert the Coliseum into a hospital for horses, gather them there by thousands, and see if music cannot cure them? That were a Jubilee worth while, if it succeeded!

The first programme (Friday evening) was as follows:

First Movement of Quintet in E flat.....Beethoven.
Beethoven Quintette Club.
Aria, "Di quella pira".....Verdi.
Mr. Packard.
Cavatina, "Elegna nel Silenzio".....Lucia.....Donizetti.
Mrs. Moulton.
Piano Solo. Rhapsodie Hongroise.....Liszt.
Miss Mehlig.
Aria, "Per questa bella mano".....Mozart.
Mr. Whitney. ('cello obligato by Wulf Fries)
Aria, "Non conosci".....Mignon.....Thomas.
Miss Phillips.
Quintet. Op. 160. (Flute, Violins, &c.).....Schubert.
Duet. Crown Diamonds.....Auber.
Song, "Evening".....Clay.
Long. "Ma mere était Bohémienne".....Masse.
Song, "The Mariner".....Diehl.
Arietta. { a. O Fatima.....Weber.
b. Son leggier.....Donizetti.
c. Nocturne.....Chopin.
Piano Solo. { d. Improvisation.....Liszt.
e. Soirée de Vienne.....Schubert—Liszt.
"Waldscenen".....Schumann.

The new Quintette Club (Mr. C. N. ALLEN, first Violin; Mr. WATTS, second, do.; Mr. J. M. MULLALLY, first Viola; Mr. CHAS. KOPFITS, second Viola and Flute; and Mr. WULF FRIES, 'cello), made a very good impression, considering that the place was altogether too vast for anything of that kind. The movement from Beethoven went very smoothly; and Mr. Kopfits's flute playing was masterly in the arrangement which he had made from Schubert's flute and piano variations on his song "Trockne Blumen." Mrs. MOULTON looked and sang more beautifully than ever. Her cantabile was delicious, and the liquid fluency of her execution in the three florid pieces, as well as all the phrasing and expression, won a cordial response from all the audience. Miss PHILLIPS was in excellent condition and won an easy victory in every effort; her "Mignon" aria was full of feeling. Mr. WHITNEY's grand basso did not fail him, and the Mozart Aria, with the 'cello obligato played by Mr. FRIES, gave true artistic pleasure. Mr. PACKARD has returned from Europe with his fine tenor voice considerably equalized and strengthened, and sang his two pieces in a chaste, sweet, honest style, once showing that he can command a very musical and full high C in the chest voice. Miss MEHLIG was welcomed with the warmth that always greets her, and her performance was as brilliant and as fine as ever. The Hungarian Rhapsody by Liszt was not the one we had so often heard, but almost quite as interesting, and it was admirably rendered.

We could not be present at the next day's matinee, and have only room to say that the programme, but for the involuntary absence of Miss Mehlig, who was to have played the "Moonlight" Sonata, was as good as the first one.

POPULAR ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.—The first series of concerts (by whom given it does not appear), essentially similar to those formerly given for so many years by the musicians themselves, under the name "Orchestral Union," took place at the Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon. The plan is: 1. A small orchestra, composed of about three-fifths of the Harvard orchestra, being the same musicians with the same conductor (Carl Zerrahn), and in great part prepared by the same rehearsals; 2. popular prices; 3. programmes in which lighter music is mingled with classical. There was a very fair attendance, and the execution of the following really choice programme, on the whole quite successful, though there was some roughness and some thinness, and the instruments were too loud in accompanying the singer, was evidently much enjoyed.

Overture, "Meeresstille".....Mendelssohn.
Song, "The Tear".....Stigall.
Mrs. C. A. Barry.
Concerto in D minor.....Mendelssohn.
Mr. J. C. D. Parker.
Symphony in D.....Mozart.
Cavatina, "Il soave e bel contento".....Pacini.
Polacca in C, for Piano and 'cello.....Chopin.
Messrs. Parker and Wulf Fries.
a. Waltz, "1001 Nights".....Strauss.
b. Polka, "Sylphiden".....Rietmi.

Next in Order.

HARVARD MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.—The first SYMPHONY CONCERT of the subscription series of ten will take place next Thursday afternoon, at three o'clock, preceded by a public rehearsal on Wednesday at the same hour. The Symphony will be the No. 1 of Beethoven, in C,—the only one of the nine which has never yet been heard in these concerts, and the revival will be interesting. There will be three of the finest overtures: namely, the noble Athalie of Mendelssohn, the short and brilliant Alfonso and Estrella by Schubert, (both of these for the second time only), and the ever welcome Genoveva of Schumann for a Finale. The two grand Concert Arias to be sung with orchestra are worthy of the best powers of Madame RUDERSDORFF, who is perfectly at home in such great music. The first, Haydn's famous Cantata "Ariadne at Naxos," never yet sung in this country, will surprise most hearers by an intensity of dramatic passion which they would hardly expect from Haydn. The other, by Mozart, "Ch'io mi scordi," is the one that was first introduced here last year, having with the orchestra a pianoforte obligato part which Mozart wrote for himself to play.

MESSRS. HUGO LEONHARD AND JULIUS EICHBERG will give another series of their delightful classical matinees at Mechanics' Hall, beginning on Thursday, Nov. 14, and alternating fortnightly with the Symphony Concerts. Lovers of Bach, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Chopin, &c., need but a hint to feel the magnet.

MR. CARLYLE PETERSHLEA has resumed his Piano Recitals before the pupils of his Music School and friends at Wesleyan Hall. His first programme, Wednesday, Oct. 30, was as follows:

Capriccio Brillante. Op. 23.....Mendelssohn.
Andante Favori.....Beethoven.
Polonaise, Op. 46, No. 1.....Chopin.
Etude, Op. 25, No. 3.....Rubinstein.
Cradle Song.....Gottschalk.
Capriccio Hongroise.....Ketterer.

THE NEW-ENGLAND CONSERVATORY continues its Recitals with its usual frequency, at Wesleyan Hall. This is the programme of the two hundred and forty-seventh, Oct. 26, at 1 P. M.

Quartet for Piano, Violin, &c.....Mozart.
Messrs. Butler, Ford, Mehler and Fries.
Song, "Non over".....Mottel.
Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen.
Clarinet Solo, "Elegie".....August Kiel.
Mr. Gustav Rudolphsen.
Trio in G, for Piano, Violin and 'Cello.....Haydn.
Messrs. Butler, Ford and Wulf Fries.
Song, "Madje".....Gounod.
Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen.

MR. EUGENE THAYER's Free Organ Recitals are continued every Friday, at 3 P. M., at the First Church (Berkeley and Marlboro' Sts.). They present a great deal of the best of organ music, on one of the best of organs, in a masterly way. Here is the first programme of the season (Oct. 4), a fair sample of all the rest.

Toccata, in D minor.....Bach.
Vorspiel: "Wir glauben all".....
For two manuals and double pedals.
Fugue, in G minor, Book 2.....Bach.
Mr. Frank Donahoe.
Fifth Organ Concerto.....Handel.
Vorspiel: { a. Herlich thut mich,
b. Es ist das Heil.....Bach.
Mr. Donahoe.
Variations in A Major, Op. 47.....Hesse.

Professor F. L. Ritter.

Professor and Mme. Ritter have returned to the city after a summer tour at the seaside and among the mountains. We learn that Prof. Ritter brings with him, as the fruit of summer leisure, the completed score of a Third Symphony, composed in illustration of one of Victor Hugo's finest poems; and also a fantasia for bass clarinet and orchestra, written for Mr. Boehm, the well-known clarinet player, and Vice-President of the New York Philharmonic Society. The second volume of Mr. Ritter's "History of Music" will be issued during the coming winter, and it is the author's intention to deliver these lectures orally, in New York and elsewhere, prior to publication. Our readers will remember with what success Prof. Ritter gave the lectures that form his first volume three winters ago, at Association Hall, Weber's Rooms, Vassar College, and other collegiate institutions, in and out of the city. This second volume will be especially interesting. It includes, among other subjects, lectures on the serious opera, the comic opera, and instrumental music to the present day, with a critical resumé of the whole field of musical literature, and a catalogue of the best works that have been written on the subject in the principal European languages.

The New York Musik Zeitung thus reviews Prof. Ritter's recent article on "Music," in the German American Encyclopedia. We translate:

"Schern's German-American Encyclopedia."—The sixty-eighth part, just issued, of this work, contains, among other excellent articles, one eight-page article on "Music," as we perceive from the editorial remarks, by Prof. F. L. Ritter (who, our readers may not be aware, wields the pen with equal facility in the French, German and English languages). This article contains everything on this rich subject that it is possible to say within so small a space, and it is quite of especial value, giving, as it does, toward the close, an account of all that has been produced and reproduced in music in America. With comparatively few strokes, in a strictly condensed style, so clear and complete a picture of American musical life is given that more is scarcely to be desired. And it is of the more value since, as far as we know, no such article has hitherto appeared in any German-American musical work. Beginning with the old-fashioned psalmody, imported by the English Puritans, Mr. Ritter gradually leads us onward to the present day, in which Europe sends to us her greatest artists, while instrumental music is worthily cultivated within the country itself; in short, he gives a just insight into all that interests us as regards the development of music here. We have no doubt that the latter part of this admirable article will be republished as an addition to all articles on music in scientific European publications."—N. Y. Weekly Review.

Musical Convention and Festival at Worcester, Mass.

(From the Palladium, Oct. 18.)

The Musical Convention commenced on Monday morning, under very flattering auspices; rehearsals were immediately commenced, and continued during the day and evening, with the exception of the "social hour," which was postponed from the afternoon. Tuesday was similarly occupied, and work has gone on to-day also. This evening the first concert takes place, the programme consisting of miscellaneous selections by the chorus, with solos, duets, &c., from favorite performers. Miss Ingraham, formerly soprano singer at the Church of the Unity, is to be the leading attraction; her singing always gives delight to Worcester audiences, and it will be a pleasure to again listen to her after her long absence. Master Van Raalte, the promising boy violinist from the Boston Conservatory, and Mr. J. F. Rudolphsen, are excellent attractions, and other performers are also announced. Thursday evening, the quartet of soloists will appear for the first time; Mrs. Moulton will sing Meyerbeer's "Shadow Dance," and a popular ballad; Miss Phillips "Una Voce Poco Fa," and the "Laughing Song" by Bendelari; Mr. Simpson selects Stigell's "Isoline," and "Sunshine and Shade" by Randegger; Dr. Guilmette Scena ed Aria "Le Chalet" by Adolph Adam, and two exquisite Scotch selections, with accompaniments by Beethoven, for violin, 'cello and piano.

FIFTH DAY.

(From the Spy, Oct. 19.)

All are unanimous in the verdict that yesterday closed the most successful and complete musical demonstration that ever took place in Worcester, and, in fact, we think good judges will award it a position among the very first which ever took place in the state. Differing from the festivals of the Handel and Haydn Society of Boston, in presenting grand miscellaneous vocal and instrumental concerts, including entire symphonies, and similar in producing entire oratorios, with a large and well drilled chorus, with solos and concerted music by the best artists in the country, and conductors having no superiors. Increasing interest from day to day, and decided progress in the choral preparations, finally culminated in the presentation of two magnificent entertainments, sufficient without any others for the week's work. The morning session was given to Mr. Zerrahn in a rehearsal of "Elijah," with the orchestra and solo artists. We are pleased to know that Messrs. Zerrahn and Emerson are gratified with the abundant success attending their labors, and that the chorus are unanimous in acknowledging the great benefit derived from their valuable instructions. It now only remains for us to report as faithfully as possible the two closing concerts.

THIRD GRAND CONCERT.

The Symphony concert is always anticipated with delight by every lover of good music; in fact, to many, it is the principal attraction of the week. The Boston Orchestral Union appeared with full numbers, including some of the first instrumental performers in Boston. Among the number we noticed Wulf Fries, Suck, and others no less distinguished. Notwithstanding a drenching rain, another crowded house of eager expectants were present, and promptly at three o'clock Mr. Zerrahn appeared, and in obedience to his magic wand the entertainment commenced with the overture to "Alfonso and Estrella," by Schubert. It was soon evident that the orchestra were never in better condition, and a sympathetic chord between orchestra and audience was at once apparent. The faithful and effective rendering of this charming overture, so full of beautiful melodies and intricate harmonies, was a happy prelude to the good things which followed. Rode's famous air with variations was next given by Mrs. Moulton, in which she fully sustained the honors awarded her on Thursday evening. The exquisite beauty of her voice, and delicate and bird-like vocalization, were, if possible, nearer perfection than exhibited on her first appearance. An encore of course followed, and without delay she responded with the fine ballad, "Marjorie's Almanac," in a style characteristic of her wonderful powers.

Two movements from the concerto in E flat for two pianos, with orchestral accompaniments, by Mozart, were executed in a superb manner on the two "grands" by Messrs. Allen and Story. This was to us one of the most enjoyable pieces in the programme. We regretted the omission of the third movement, which was done on account of the length of the programme. "Ave Maria," by Cherubini, received a chaste and truly noble rendering by Dr. Guilmette. It was sung with a tender and impressive style, seldom attainable except by a good contralto. The orchestral accompaniment added greatly to its beauty. We are glad our Worcester audiences are beginning to appreciate this kind of music. Dr. G. appeared in response to an encore and sang with great depth of feeling a Scotch ballad entitled "Sunset," with beautiful obligato accompaniments for piano, violin and violoncello, by Beethoven. It was a charming little morceau, and almost too choice and rare for the concert room. The symphony in D, by Mozart, was the great production of the afternoon, and elicited strong marks of admiration at the close of every movement. We have not heard for a long time such fine instrumental effects from an orchestra of this size. Their playing seemed to us very much improved since last year.

Miss Phillips rendered with almost regal splendor the rondo, "O, mio Fernando," by Donizetti, in the opera of "Favorita." Such gushings of melody and harmonious combinations of orchestra and voice were truly a treat seldom enjoyed.

In response to the enthusiastic plaudits of the audience, she returned and repeated the last movement. Mr. Simpson was the last although not the least of the great artists to appear. His selection was the Romanza, Spirito gentil, by Donizetti, with organ accompaniment. It exhibited in a striking manner the rare beauty of his voice and his pure and chaste method. The concert closed with a concert waltz, "Thousand and one nights," by Strauss, which was charmingly produced, eliciting rounds of applause.

THE MENDELSSOHN ORATORIO.

The great musical demonstrations of the week culminated in the representation of Mendelssohn's sublime oratorio of Elijah last evening. In defiance of the storm, which had steadily increased during the afternoon another large audience assembled, and the great chorus appeared with full ranks, much to their credit, and performed the choral parts of the oratorio in an admirable manner. Very decided improvement from last year's representation was evident, showing most conclusively the propriety and importance of giving the same oratorio two years in succession. Although some of the choruses lacked power, and there was hesitation in taking up the parts which were in the fugue style, still the great efficiency of others more than atoned for these little deficiencies. We were particularly pleased with the rendering of "Yet doth the Lord," "Baal, we cry to Thee," "Thanks be to God," and "He watching over Israel." The double quartet, "For he shall give his angels," was a fine illustration of concerted music. The blending of the voices of the great artists, and the ladies and gentlemen who took the subordinate parts, was very fine. The choral, "Cast thy burden on the Lord," was impressively performed. The angel trio, "Lift thine eyes," sung by Mrs. Moulton, Miss Phillips, and Mrs. Munroe, was performed in a style worthy the beauty of the music. Their voices were well adapted to a proper rendering of this exquisite little tone poem of the great composer.

It now only remains for us to notice the solo parts of this favorite oratorio. Knowing that Mrs. Moulton had had but little experience in singing oratorio music, and that this was really her first attempt in sustaining a complete role, we were interested to note whether she would be as successful as in the concert programme. She at once manifested her ability to interpret this style of music. Her success was decided and gratifying. Her recitatives and airs were rendered in a style appropriate to the character of the music, and gave entire satisfaction. The great soprano aria, "Hear ye, Israel," was one of her happiest efforts, and equal to any of her performances during the week. We hope to hear her again in oratorio.

Of the great merits of Miss Phillips in oratorio, it is almost superfluous to speak. She has long been known at home and abroad as an exponent of oratorio music, having no superior. Every little recitation and air was given with a perfection leaving nothing to be desired. The aria, "O, rest in the Lord," was sung with a beauty of style which all must long remember. She conferred a great favor in repeating it in response to the desire of her listeners. Mr. Geo. Simpson, ever true and artistic in all he undertakes, has, we believe, no superior in this country in his department of oratorio. Where everything was well done it is not necessary to mention particular pieces, and we will only refer to the solo, "If with all your hearts," as one with which we were specially delighted. He fully sustained his role throughout and position in the quartet of eminent artists. Of Dr. Guilmette we write with a feeling of sadness, because this was to be his last appearance in public as a vocalist. Devoted as he is to his profession, he thinks it his duty to abjure music in a public manner for the more important duties which he owes to himself and family. . . . Although all was good, we will only refer to the great solo of the oratorio "If with all your hearts," as a masterly effort.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- I'm fair Titania. (Io son Titania). 6. Bb to c. Thomas. 50
O, light winged, happy Swallow. (Leggiere rondinel). Duet. 6. D to a. Thomas. 60
These belong to a set entitled "Beauties of Mignon," and are filled with light, fairy or bird-like music, requiring, of course, considerable ability to execute it.
The Laugh of a Child. Quartet. 3. E to f. Dr. Maurer. 35
—The laugh of a child.
Now rippling and gentle, now merry and wild.
Pretty and easy glee or 4 part song for mixed voices.
The Answer. 5. Eb to g. Fossier. 30
"Fair spring was mine,—it would not stay!
Bright youth was mine,—I dreamed it away."
The Myth. 5. D to g. Fossier. 30
"The birds sleep from their singing,
The roses from their bloom."
The above two songs are distinguished by careful elaboration of the air and accompaniment. The poetry is of a high order. Music difficult, but will pay for study.
Ave Maria. Trio. Soprano, Alto, Tenor. 4. Gilbert. 40
Bb to h.
A sweet Catholic hymn, with Latin and English words.
Have mercy, Lord, on me. Quartet. 4 Eb to a. Deems. 60
"Mercy alone can meet my case,
For mercy, Lord, I cry."
Very sweet, gliding music, like Italian soffogio in character, and blending perfectly with the smooth poetry of the hymn.
When the Milk goes round. Comic. 2. D to d. Conolly. 30
We'll go home with the milk in the morning.

Instrumental.

- 12 Beautiful Compositions of Concione. Selected and Fingered by G. D. Wilson. ea. 30
1 Le Ruisseau. 7 L'Elegante.
2 Scherzetto. 8 Crescendo.
3 Souvenir de L'Exile. 9 Extase.
4 Tarantelle. 10 Espérance.
5 Simple History. 11 Nuit Mystérieuse.
6 La Nacelle. 12 Riant Reveil.
The above 12 compositions are well worth of careful examination by teachers. They are about on the plane of Heller's and Czerny's Studies of expression, but the melodies are more defined, and while they produce the same effect on the taste of players that good soffogio do on that of singers, they also have many passages admirably qualified to develop a smooth and even style of execution.
12 Characteristic and pleasing Compositions by Concione. Selected and Fingered by Wilson. 30
1 La Foileuse, 30 7 Anxiété, 30
2 Moissonneures, 40 8 Réverie, 30
3 Conte d'Enfant, 30 9 Ronde des Archers, 30
4 Melancolie, 50 10 Marche Triumphale, 35
5 Papillons, 30 11 L'Hirondelle, 30
6 Doux Souvenirs, 30 12 Nuit Etoilée, 30
All that can be said of the other set may be said of this, as one is a continuation of the other. The pieces are of the 3d or 4th degree of difficulty.
Gottschalk Waltz. 5. Ab. Teresa Carrino. 75
A composition of the (now) very distinguished pianist, when she was perhaps 12 years of age, and now again brought to notice, as a remarkable composition for a child, and one of which no one should be ashamed, as it is really very fine.
At Rest. Notturmo. 4. Eb. Chassagnac. 40
A little brighter than average Notturmo, but one can "rest" while in playing it with much pleasure.
Oakwood Waltzes. 3. Ab. Mc G. C. 30
Will please, played at Oakwood, or anywhere else.

Books.

- GEMS OF STRAUSS. A Collection of Waltzes, Polkas, Quadrilles, &c. By Johann Strauss. Boards, 2.50
Cloth, 3.00
The publishers almost fear to continue advertising this attractive book, the demand so far exceeds their expectations. But all are welcome to purchase it. It has 250 large pages, filled "to the brim" with the best works of the great Master of Dance Music.
40 VOCAL EXERCISES. By Vincenzo Cirillo. 3.00
This book of Vocalization, just issued, is to be used in the New National College of Music, established by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club. Likely to be widely introduced.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

The Ballad of Boston Fire.

NOVEMBER 10, 1872.

BY G. F. LATHROP.

Oh! that deep shout! The impassive, sparkling sky

Gives it a keen rebound,
And sends it swift through every heart—the cry
Of helpers nearing. Fiercely they drove by,
And echoes swept the ground.

All night the wild flames wrapped the eastern vault,

Blasting the chilly stars:
And on the prostrate town the fierce assault
Of fire smote blow on blow, and without halt,
In broad, red-streaming scars,

Till morning's brimming light rose o'er the marge.

Then smoke as from the pyre
Of some slain host floats slowly, dark and large,
Against the dawn. Hark to the bursting charge!
Oh! Boston is on fire!

Now human deeds meet human needs, for now
Self is no longer known.

Unconscious right gives godlike strength to bow
The furious foe. And in this hour, I trow,
No man is weak or lone;

For all partake a common heritage

Of sympathy and power;
Proud piles laid low, these make a noble stage
Where men their equals know by Nature's gauge,
And none need cringe or cower.

The next day passed; the night, with tumbling swells

Of resonant bells, and gleams
Of deadly fire, and shouts—sounds like shattering shells,

Earth-muffled—tumult that the morn dispels;
Then all is o'er, it seems.

Great hours and sad! What splendor swept away!
What brave wounds won, what death!

Yet great; for to have shared such griefs, I say,
Is priceless gain. Oh! to have bled that day
And drawn a hero's breath!

Moscheles in London.

1823.—We have spoken of the conscientiousness with which Moscheles corrected the proof of his published compositions as something unique, perhaps, in its way. He was not less particular about his lessons; so he was a good deal annoyed that winter by a lady pupil well advanced in years. She had already seen her 60 summers and was, like her somewhat older brother, unmarried. "Both of them are dressed according to the fashion of their youth, which gives the short and thick-set pair a comical appearance. Her tall head-dress, his nankeen trousers, blue frock and gilded buttons are enough to convulse one with laughter—especially the old maid. She seems determined not to learn, for as often as I urge her to play during the 45 to 50 minutes which I devote to her, I can scarcely bring her to it. The good woman is a great talker, but she is also hospitable. I have to breakfast with her every time, and while I am eating she narrates, until I finally compel her to try her gouty, gristly little fingers on a modern piece. My conscience does not permit me to pocket the guinea, which she hands me neatly wrapped up every time, if the pupil and I have not been industrious together."

Moscheles was much astonished at the English custom, in orchestral concerts, of seating some celebrated musician at the pianoforte in front, and on the occasion of a Philharmonic concert we find the question: "What do they mean by 'Conductor, Mr. Clementi'?" He sits there turning over the leaves of the score, but without his marshal's staff, or baton, so that he cannot lead his musical army. That is done solely by the leading violinist (Vorzeiger), and the conductor is a nullity. And think now of this programme! C-minor symphony of Beethoven, played here for the first time; and right after this sublime work—this feast for the gods—a set of flute variations, a violin concerto, and various arias. Added to this, Mozart's G-minor symphony, and, for the conclusion, an overture by Romberg—a programme which I write down here so that I never may forget it."

Many were the English dilettanti who made it an especial honor to themselves to be in intercourse with artists, and let themselves be heard in competition with them in their grand soirees. Thus Sir W. Curtis on the 'cello, Mrs. Oom on the piano, and likewise Mrs. Fleming; Prince Leopold and Princess Sophia, the sister of King George IV., were constant and attentive listeners. But Moscheles complains: "I have to make and hear too much shallow music."

As a peculiar and edifying festival, he describes the annual musical service of the 6,000 charity school children in St. Paul's Cathedral. "The moment when the whole crowd of children rise at once, is imposing. But (he adds) how could all, with that powerful organ accompaniment to the psalms, which they sang in unison, also get out of tune unisono? In fact, they fell every time a quarter of a tone! From this one may infer the small musical endowment of the nation."

1825.—Moscheles and his wife commonly passed their Sundays at Clementi's, in Elstree, not far from London, where there was a chamber always kept in readiness for them. "Clementi is one of the most vigorous septuagenarians one can meet. Very early in the morning we observed him from our window, with his bald head uncovered in spite of the morning dew, running about in the garden. His lively disposition never lets him rest. At the table he is never weary of talking and joking; he can also become violent, for he is a hot-blooded Italian nature. He can seldom be induced to play any more. He declares that he has had a stiff hand ever since he fell from a sledge in Russia; there are people who think he is unwilling to play any more, because the bravura has made such progress as to be beyond his reach. His wife (it is his second wife) forms the greatest contrast to him. She is English, and as moderate and calm as he is sparkling and vivacious." Clementi was at that time proprietor, with the brothers Collard, of an enterprising piano-making business. Moscheles ascribes to the instruments of their make a lighter touch than to those of Broadwood, on which account he used them by preference for his performances in public; he also found their tone more brilliant, whereas Broadwood, with a somewhat duller sound and heavier action, aimed more at fulness of tone. William Collard, the younger brother, he calls "one of the cleverest men he ever came across." He was the intimate friend and adviser of the young couple; he, too, was regularly to be found at Elstree. When the friends were together Clementi used to say: "Moscheles, play me something." Then M. would choose some sonata by his host, who, during the performance, swayed his little thick-set figure to and fro with a satisfied smile, his hands behind his back, and often exclaimed "Bravo!" and patting Moscheles, when he had done, upon the shoulder, overwhelmed him with new bravos.

At length "the season has been fought through;" they can leave London and taste the sweets of real rest. They accept an invitation of the Fleming family to Stoneham Park (Southampton). The lady of the house was a pupil of Moscheles. Both she and her husband, simple and genial people, with all their wealth and luxury, zealously exerted themselves to make their stay as agreeable as possible to their guests. So far as personal intercourse was concerned they succeeded perfectly; but the "high life" did not always agree with Moscheles and his wife. "We cannot enjoy the wonderfully beautiful park so fully, because we only get to bed between one and two o'clock after midnight; so we have to spend the morning hours in sleep, and it is almost eleven o'clock before the toilet is made for breakfast. After this meal I am left to myself, for composing or practising, only until two o'clock, when luncheon is served. (The Etudes in E flat major and A-minor were composed here.) My Charlotte practises with Mrs. Fleming in the splendid music-hall, where the grand piano sounds like an organ, or they pass the time reading and working in the boudoir tapestried with bright blue silk, in which are heaped all the last books that have appeared in the literary world, while the lovely group they form with the Fleming children is reflected back upon them from eight mirrors. At luncheon the question is asked, what carriage—what horses are desired? Mrs. Fleming lays claim to my wife for her pony carriage, in which she is her own coachman; so I ride with some gentlemen. The second toilet, for the dinner, must be finished by eight o'clock in the evening." Further on he writes: "Just now Lord Palmerston, his brother, Mr. Temple, his sister, Mrs. Sullivan, and her husband, too, are here. It is interesting to be so near his Lordship and to hear the Parliamentary conversation that is carried on at the table, of course all in the interests of the purest Toryism. Well that the art I represent may stand on neutral ground!" Again we read: "To-day new guests, this time from the neighborhood, although not from the nearest, since all the land for ten English miles around belongs to our host; besides which he has an estate on the Isle of Wight. When dinner is over and the gentlemen remain by themselves, then politics begin in earnest; but towards midnight in the drawing room Art gains the upper hand again; then there is music-making until one or two o'clock; no wonder that the first rays of the morning sun do not wake us."

1826.—On the 7th of April Moscheles performed, for the first time publicly, his "Recollections of Ireland," which were warmly received. The concert room was crowded to excess, probably owing to the presence of CARL MARIA VON WEBER, who directed an aria of his own, sung by Mme. Caradori, and his overture to Euryanthe. The great man had been in London for a few weeks when this concert occurred. He stayed at the house of his friend, Sir George Smart, where Moscheles often saw him, though he was not accessible to the curious crowd that wished to call on him. His seriously shattered state of health required that rest, for which he could have little opportunity. "How it must have affected him when he appeared yesterday, for the first time, before an English public, in Covent Garden Theatre! The thundering applause with which he was received touched us all deeply; how much more him, the honored guest, the object of all this enthusiasm! Weber directed on the stage an abridgement of his Freyshuets. The overture was repeated with jubilant applause. Braham, Miss Paton and Phillips sang the principal pieces of the opera with inspiration. Weber reached out his hands to the singers during the enthusiastic applause to express his gratification. At the end of the performance the whole pit stood upon the benches, waving hats and handkerchiefs and cheering the master. I saw him afterwards utterly exhausted in the foyer of the theatre; he was already too sick to enjoy this unwonted triumph in a foreign land so fully, as we, his countrymen, enjoyed it for him:—besides me, above all his own and our own poet, Kind, the flute-player, Furstenau, who had travelled with him, the good old harp maker, Stumpff, who had been settled for years in London, and the often mentioned Schulz."

On the 12th of March, Moscheles heard Weber improvise in a party at the house of Braham, the singer. He interwove some themes from the Freyshuets in the most interesting manner, although without any special manifestation of power. This, alas! his physical condition would no longer allow, and yet he hurried off at 11 o'clock to a second great soiree at Mrs. Coutt's, because she had paid him well. After he had left Braham's his melancholy condition was much talked about."

On the 18th of March Weber is a guest at the dinner-table of Moscheles. "What a pleasure! But even there our sympathy was most deeply moved, for he entered our sitting-room speechless: the one short flight of stairs which led up to it had completely taken away his breath. He sank into a chair that stood near the door, but soon recovered himself, and was then the most amiable, most bright and genial of companions. In the evening we drove with him to the Philharmonic concert, the first which he had heard, and where a Haydn and a Beethoven symphony were given satisfactorily."

The next Philharmonic concert, on the 3rd of April, was conducted by Weber himself. This was the programme:

Overtures to "Euryanthe" and "Freyshuets."
Aria by Weber (composed by Mme. Milder) sung by Mme. Caradori.
1. C-sharp Minor Concerto by Ritz; 2. E-flat do. by Beethoven; 3. Hungarian Rondo by Pizis (this Pizziccio was played by a German, Schunke, under the direction of the great German master!)

"On the 11th of April I attended the general rehearsal of Oberon in Covent Garden Theatre, which was as full as if it were the performance, and without interruption; the costumes, too, as well as the splendid scenery with the rising moon in the "Ocean" aria, were remarkably fine. This Aria, which Weber wrote in London for Miss Paton, made a grand effect, as well as the great Aria in the part of Huon, composed for Braham. To both singers was given the opportunity to display their powerful voices and produce certain striking effects, which caused great enthusiasm in the pit. Weber at his desk must have felt that the whole English nation cheered him in that assembly, and that here his works are bound to live."

Of the first performance the papers had nothing but what was excellent to report. But the poor master himself whom Moscheles visited almost daily, was growing weaker and weaker in the midst of these triumphs; yet he kept up his active London life and directed in several concerts, in which Moscheles also took part, his overtures to Freyshuets, Oberon, &c.

"On the 18th of May (say Moscheles) we co-operated in an original manner in behalf of Braham. It was his annual benefit at Covent Garden Theatre, and he, the most popular of English singers, always knew how to delight his third gallery (called, on account of its dizzy height, the 'seat of the gods') by sailor songs. To-day it was the same as usual on like occasions. Moreover, that popular coquette, Mme. Vestris, found a willing audience in those 'gods,' who rule the house, in an operetta called 'The Slave,' and in divers nursery songs, like 'Goosie, Goosie Gander,' &c. So far, all went splendidly; but Braham had missed his reckoning when he undertook to set before this company a concert of good music as a second part, which he named 'Apollo's Festival,' and which, after all the fadaises that had gone before, began with Weber's Overture to The Ruler of the Spirits. Did no one observe that Weber himself conducted? I know not; but the shouting and screaming of the gallery, amid which it was played through unheard to the end, enraged me; and, already much excited, I seated myself at my instrument upon the stage and gave a sign to the orchestra below me to begin my 'Recollections of Ireland.' Immediately, during the somewhat serious introduction, the rude gallery crowd began its unruly conduct—whistling, hissing, applauding, and calling out: 'Are you comfortable, Jack?' &c., &c., accompanied by salvos of sucked orange peels. I saw and heard it all in alternating crecendo and decrescendo, and it seemed to me as if all the elements were at war, and I should have to succumb to it. But God be praised, I did not succumb, for in this new and unexpected situation I conceived the resolution not to break off suddenly, but to show to the better part of the public that I was prepared to fulfil what I had promised. I leaned down to the violin leader and said: 'I will keep moving my hands to and fro as if I were playing; let your orchestra do about the same. After a while I will give you a sign, and then we will cease together. No sooner said than done. As I went bowing off the stage, I was overwhelmed with a storm of applause. The 'gods' were jubilant at getting rid of me. And now came on Miss Paton with a serious concert aria, and had a similar fate. She stopped three times, came back again at the call of the better audience, who demanded 'silence,' and tried to sing, but finally went off weeping with the words: 'I cannot sing.' This demonstration was followed by thundering applause; and now began new street ballads, sailor songs, &c., &c., and new satisfaction and attention in the galleries."

The affair was talked of in the newspapers a week long, and Moscheles won much praise for his cool behavior, while poor Miss Paton had much to suffer for her tears.

From Goethe.

Goods gone—something gone!
Must bend to the oar,
And earn thee some more.
Honor gone—much gone!
Must go and gain glory;
Then the idling gossips will alter their story.
Courage gone—all's gone!
Better never have been born!

Science.

O Science! with thy cold, gray, piercing eye,
How grand and startling are thy mysteries,
Making the earth unveil her histories,
Searching creation's secrets far and nigh!
With joy I follow thee, and read thy ways,
In flower and leaf, in sun and planet shown;
No farthest star-dust but to thee is known,
No meanest atom can escape thy gaze.
But the great thoughts that bid our spirits pause,
Those words before whose meanings, deep and high,
We bow in silent awe, and baffled lie,
Life, Death, Eternity—the great First Cause!
Before them mute thou liest with the rest,
Nor canst or doubt dispel, or hope suggest.

My First Meeting with Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

[From the German of Prof. J. C. Lobe.]

A QUARTET AT GOETHE'S.

It was in the beginning of November, in the year 1821, that three members of the Court Chapel at Weimar (I, the writer of these lines one of the three) were ordered to the presence of Lord Gheimmrath von Goethe, and conducted by his servants to the well-known apartment, arranged in the front in the following manner. Three desks stood by the side of an opened grand piano ready for us. Upon these lay a roll of notes. Inquisitive as I ever was and am now in anything relating to music, I eagerly turned over the leaves and saw: Studies in double counterpoint; another part had Fugues written over it; a third, Canons; then came a Quartet for Piano, arranged with accompaniment of violin, viola and 'cello. Upon every part stood the name of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. The notes were written in a firm, elegant hand, and as well as I could learn from a hasty glance, showed the work of a capable and accomplished artist. The name Mendelssohn, like the music, was unknown to us.

We took our instruments in our hands, and as a preliminary step were putting them in tune with the piano, when in walked a tall man, who from his military, erect bearing might be taken for a Guard master of former days. To me he was no stranger, for I had visited the year previous in Berlin. It was Prof. Zelter, the well-known director of the Singing Academy at Berlin, Goethe's true friend.

He greeted us kindly, and me as an old acquaintance. "I am going, dear sirs, at the very outset, to make a request of you. You will become acquainted with a boy 12 years old, my scholar, Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. His skill as a performer on the piano, and better still his talent as a composer will make you enthusiastic. The shouting of amateurs affects him not; but for the opinion of musicians he listens eagerly, and takes each one for a bright pure coin, for the young boy is naturally too inexperienced to distinguish between well wishing encouragement and merited acknowledgment. Therefore, my dear sirs, if you should become stirred up to a song of praise,—a thing I can at the same time wish and fear,—be moderate, not too enthusiastic, but let your praise be in C major, the sincere tone. Up to this time I have warned him of over-estimation of self and conceit, the cursed enemies of all artistic success."

Before we could return anything to this in some measure remarkable speech, Felix came bounding in, a beautiful boy with decidedly Jewish features, slender and supple, with long wavy black locks, flowing down his neck. Spirit and life sparkled from his eyes. He looked at us one instant with an inquisitive glance, then walked up and gave each a friendly confiding grasp of the hand like an old acquaintance.

Goethe, who entered with Felix, returned our respectful bows with friendly greeting. "My friend," nodding to Zelter, "has brought with him a little Berliner who will give us a great treat in his performance. Now, shall we learn to know him as a composer, whereto I request your assistance. So let us hear, my child, what thy young head has brought forth." With this Goethe stroked the boy's curly head.

He immediately ran to the notes, laid the parts for us on the desks, placed the principal part on the piano and hastily took his seat upon the stool. Zelter stationed himself a little behind Felix; Goethe a few paces to the right, with his hands crossed behind his back. The little composer gave a hasty glance at us; we laid on the bow; a motion from his curly head, and the play began. Goethe listened with the closest attention to every part, without making any more particular demonstration than a "good" to one part, to another a "Bravo," which he accompanied with an assenting nod. We, remembering Zelter's admonition, showed to the boy, whose color mounted higher and higher, only by our countenances our delighted approval.

When the last part was ended Felix sprang up from his seat, and looked around the circle with a speaking glance; but Goethe (probably at a sign from Zelter) spoke and said to Felix: "Very well, my son; the countenances of these gentlemen," pointing to us, "speak out plainly enough that thy work has pleased them well. Now go out into the garden, one awaits thee there, and amuse and cool thyself. Thou now glowest with heat."

Without anything farther Felix sprang to the door. When we raised our questioning looks to Goethe to know if we should leave, he said: "Tarry a little, my masters; my friend and I wish to hear your opinion of the boy's composition."

It is now so long since that entertainment that after the lapse of so many years I may not be able to give a full and particular account of it; especially as I find no record of it in my note book. But some circumstances I have ever remembered, which my later nearer relations with Mendelssohn served to fix in my memory.

Goethe regretted that we had only learned to know the little one in a quartet. "The wonderful musical children," said he, "are in respect to technical skill not so great a rarity now-a-days; but what this little man can do in improvisation, that borders on the marvellous, and I had not believed it possible in one so young."

"And yet," said Zelter, "thou hast heard at Frankfort Mozart play in his seventh year."

"Yes," replied Goethe, "I myself was just twelve years old, and was like every one else greatly astonished at his extraordinary skill. But what thy scholar has just done is in comparison like the perfect speech of an adult with the lisping of a child."

"But the question with me," said Zelter, "is of the boy's creative talent;" and turning towards us, "what do the gentlemen think of his quartet composition?"

We on our side spoke with the entire conviction that Felix had produced as much of real worth as Mozart had at the same age. "Now one could dare to predict that the world would hold this boy as a second Mozart."

"It may be so," said Goethe, "but who can say how a spirit may develop itself in the end? We have seen so many of such promising talents pursue the wrong course and thus disappoint our high hopes."

"I am very much in earnest with the young one," said Zelter, "and keep him, besides his own original works, ever curbed by the rigid Counterpoint studies. But how long can this continue? I can really teach him nothing more, and once free, it will at once be seen in what direction his real talent lies."

"Yes," said Goethe, "that which an artist does of great and real merit must be created from himself alone. What teachers must Raphael, Michel Angelo, Mozart, Haydn, and all other distinguished masters thank for their undying creations?"

"Truly," remarked Zelter, "there have many begun like Mozart, but yet none equal him. Felix has fancy, sentiment, and apt technical science in an eminent degree; he has throughout good, sometimes charming boyish conceptions and nothing less; but yet it is only pretty music; the spirit of genius moves not in it, therefore I will not delude myself. Do you not think as I do, gentlemen?"

When he had thus spoken we could not but agree with him. "Yet," I added, "neither in Mozart's boyish compositions did the spirit of genius show itself."

Here I asked whether this quartet which we had just heard was produced by the boy alone?

"Yes, yes," answered Zelter, "all in his own hand and style. What you have just heard he brings completed without any assistance. I know well how most masters do. In order to deify their art as teachers, they scribble over the works of their scholars so that little of the original thoughts of the scholar remain, and then give it out as the work of the pupil. This is base swindling and charlatanry, which deceives not only the audience but the scholar himself, who deludes himself with the idea that it is his own work. It is an evil which has already destroyed much really fine talent and checked it in its onward course. I leave him then to discover and do what he can do. There always remains ever fresh the love of creating, and his joy in the work is not embittered by the critic. This comes soon enough of itself: The discernment awakes, and with it the impulse to new and better works. As for that, this twelve-year old boy has done more than many thirty years of age. Now, may Heaven guard this rare plant from all disturbing influences, and a splendid example will develop itself."

These were the circumstances which I now remember of my first meeting with Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

TWENTY AND SIX YEARS LATER.

Little could it be known that the strong, healthy, lively, ever cheerful and in every relation happy man was sometimes depressed with presentiments that an early death would be his fate. When he played his 'Paulus' in the Weimar City Church, we sat alone together after a rehearsal in the chamber of the crown prince, and I, at that time a great hypochondriac, remarked that I should enjoy few of his later works. "Oh my friend," said he, "you will long outlive me."

I would often jest with him about his presentiments, but he would repeat his fixed assurance in these words: "I shall not grow old." But then he would repent of such a speech, and his face would assume the most cheerful expression, and he would go to deliberating over his next rehearsal, during which was made prominent in an eminent degree the friendliness and willingness with which all his co-operators came to meet him.

How could I, with that man, beautiful in form, and in the fullness of health before me, a little over thirty years old, how could I think that in a few years his prophecy would be fulfilled?

I moved to Leipzig in 1846, found him gay, lively, on every side uninterruptedly active, had the delight of many learned, instructive conversations with him, one of which I have recorded. One year later, in 1847, just in his eighth and thirtieth year, six and twenty years after my first meeting with the beautiful, genial boy at Goethe's, they bore this great Master of Melody from his dwelling to the Church Paulina. Near his coffin walked countless mourners, the writer of these lines one of the number.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, OCT. 26.—On Thursday evening Mr. DAVID D. WOOD, the highly talented and efficient organist of St. Stephen's Church, gratified his numerous friends and admirers by giving an Organ Recital at the Church. The programme was a rare one.

Fantasia et Fuga, G Minor J. S. Bach.
Symphonia Pastorale, from the "Christmas Oratorio" J. S. Bach.
Recitative and Aria, tenor ("Deeper and Deeper Still," from "Jephtha") Handel.
Chorale, with variations, "By the Rivers of Babylon." J. S. Bach.
Twenty-third Psalm (for two soprano and two alto voices) F. Schubert.
Allegro Maestoso, wind instruments (W. T. Best's arrangement) Mozart.
Aria, Soprano, "Hear ye, Israel" Mendelssohn.
Sonata No. 6 Mendelssohn.
Aria, alto, "O pardon me, my God" (with violin obligato) J. S. Bach.
Serenade Trio (by request) Beethoven.
Quartet, Benedictus, from "Requiem Mass" Mozart.
{ a. Nachtsuck; op. 23 } R. Schumann.
{ b. Waldscenen, op. 82 } R. Schumann.
Recitative and Aria, bass, "Arm! Arm! ye brave!" from Judas Maccabæus Handel.
Chorus, "Acis and Galatea" Handel.

The organ is a superb instrument, made some five or six years ago by Mr. Simmons of your city. The mechanism is very intricate, but its effects are perfect. Mr. Wood's playing throughout the whole programme defies the subtlest criticism. His pedal execution is beyond that of any other organist I have ever heard, and his manual performance is not excelled.

The enormous difficulties of the Bach Fugue seemed to be so completely overcome that it appeared child's play in his hands. So, too, in the "By the Rivers of Babylon" chorale, written for two pedals, the lightning rapidity and crispness of the pedal part were surpassingly great. Once more, in the "Acis and Galatea" chorus, did we have a chance to notice Mr. Wood's remarkable accomplishment.

That lovely serenade of Beethoven's received an exquisitely delicate rendering; so different from the sweeping massiveness with which the Grand Chorale poured on our ears, this truly seemed like the "Benediction that follows after prayer." Again into the "Pastorale" Mr. Wood infused such a poetic sentiment that, blending with the holiness of the place, it carried us back through the dusty centuries to the silent first Christmas eve. The Mozart "Allegro Maestoso" was the least grateful of all. It seemed not to assert itself as amply as the others; but it too was mightily handled by the artist. The Schumann pieces were arranged for the organ by Mr. Wood himself, and consequently they were all that one could desire in effect and performance.

Miss Lauderbach's singing in "Hear ye, Israel," was slightly marred by her indistinct pronunciation of the words, a quality so essential to oratorio singing; but her voice was delightful, especially in the major portion. Miss Young's interpretation of the Bach aria (from the St. Matthew Passion) was entirely satisfactory; her voice is rich and pure, her method graceful. Mr. Hahn performed the violin obligato neatly and efficiently. Mr. Briscoe in his solo was remarkably successful; his style is crude and methodless and voice somewhat throaty, but his declamation was intelligent and distinct. Mr. Hamilton's singing was bad, uncertainty and misconception of the aria were not atoned for by his naturally fine voice.

OCT. 30.—On Monday last the long looked for RUBINSTEIN made his first appearance in our city; the vast Academy of Music was well-nigh crowded with an intelligent and brilliant audience. The Orchestra, under Mr. Carl Wolfsohn, opened the concert with the Egmont overture. It was only passably well done, lacking light and shade.

Then came Rubinstein; shaggy and reserved, he walked on through the rolling applause and began his D-minor concerto. This much I can say, that it interested and aroused the audience to a high state of enthusiasm. The opening allegro is a perfect bouquet of effects; tenderness growing out of stormy passion and passion dying out through tenderness. The Andante was exquisite, and the finale seemed a very Niagara of force and startling wonders. The audience was carried away, and roar after roar breaking forth showed that Philadelphia homage too was given to Rubinstein. Mr. WIENIAWSKI introduced himself to us in the Mendelssohn E-minor concerto. The same perfect purity and graceful accuracy which characterizes Rubinstein's style is Wieniawski's. Never did we hear so gratefully this perfect concerto. In his own "Legend" we were still more delighted; it is a lovely fairy piece, and, followed as it was by "Airs Russes," brought on a storm of applause, recalling the artist some six times. The closing pieces were from Rubinstein: Handel's D-minor aria and variations, Mozart's A-minor rondo, and the march from the Ruins of Athens, each winning a tribute of fresh admiration. The lady singers I did not admire. Mlle. Liebhart sang "Angels ever bright and fair," with poor phrasing, but her voice is rather good. Mlle. Ormeny sang the everlasting Cenerentola air with great spirit, but with indifferent method. At the second concert, on Tuesday, the 29th, another immense audience assembled. Herr Rubinstein gave us Beethoven's G-major Concerto. This was by far the most attractive of all his performances. The Cadences, I must say, are unrivalled in execution and have their own intrinsic merit; but this was Beethoven's Concerto, and the introduction of another's work seems like writing Washington's name with a middle letter. The Schumann "Carnival" was such a novelty here that each quickly succeeding air of the harlequin lot was more admired than its predecessor. Rubinstein was certainly Schumann for the time, for example, in the "Sphinx" and "Chopin"; it was as if he was creating as he played. Of the closing pieces, Liszt's Schubert's "Erl King" was the noblest in expression; the words seemed to be in every note; and in the closing chord, "Das Kind war tot," the very strings of the piano seemed to enunciate.

Wieniawski in his "Faust" fantasia was very great; the "Salve dimora" and "O notte splendor" were as if some celestial "Faust" was singing to him and inspiring him to his divine and tender execution. For encore he gave a well known popular song in the same clear, conscientious way as before. The Paganini "Carnival" being "encored," he played, deliciously, "Ernst's Elegie."

The selections of Rubinstein at the third concert were Schumann's A-minor concerto, a sonata of Weber's, and his own "Barcarole," "Etude," and "Melodie."

The Concerto, of course, was the event of the evening. To me it is the greatest of all piano concertos; the decisive introduction, the beautiful and delicate second movement, and the laughing Finale, all were given as only Rubinstein could do it. Wieniawski contributed his D-minor concerto. Of course it was delightful; but once or twice a lumbering blast from the French horn in the pp passages seemed very much to annoy the performer, and hence marred the particular effect. The Orchestration is exceedingly tasteful, and indeed the entire work is one of undoubted merit and worth. Rossini's "Di tanti palpiti" by Paganini, and his own "Legende," were productive of tremendous applause. His marvellous chromatic passages seemed in the Paganini fantasia to show to greater advantage than at any of the previous performances. Mlle. Liebhart sang Ardit's "Bacio" with much more savoir faire than she had hitherto showed, and in the encore, "Within a mile of Edinbro," she was positively naive. Mlle. Ormeny, in the Giuramento aria was not successful, as she was persistently out of tune.

Nov. 9.—We have been favored with three more of the Rubinstein Concerts, the first on Thursday last, and the third and last, a matinee, this afternoon. Owing to the total withdrawal of street cars and hacks, the audiences have been much smaller than those of last week.

On Thursday evening Rubinstein gave us his transcription of the Egmont overture with the vigor and effect of an orchestra. Then came the mellow, hallowed "Moonlight Sonata," softly bathing all things in the Adagio, gleaming in the Allegretto, and almost flashing in the Presto Agitato. I truly can say I had never before heard the "Moonlight Sonata." The centre of attraction of the evening was the "Kreutzer" Sonata. Often as I have heard it and as well as I imagined I knew it, it seemed as though I had read but the title before these two artists had explained it all. Chopin's C-minor Nocturne, Berceuse and A flat Polonaise were Rubinstein's contribution at the close of part first; and the end of the concert was reached through his attractive presentation of his own Romance, Barcarole and Valse Caprice.

Wieniawski's offerings to the audience were Vieuxtemp's Air varie, and an aria and prelude of Bach's. In response to the tremendous applause which greeted these two, he gave Ernst's "Elegie" and a composition of his own.

Mlle. Liebhart sung "Robin Adair" and "Ruck, Ruck," and Mlle. Ormeny the Hungarian song "Esa Villag." Last evening, announced as Rubinstein's benefit, attracted a much fuller house than that of the previous evening.

The great composer-artist gave Schubert's Fantasia on the "Wanderer," to me one of the most thoroughly enjoyable performances I have heard of him. At the close of Part I. two of Chopin's Etudes. Part II, he opened with his own Sonata for piano and violin in A-minor (?). The effect was to arouse a desire to hear it again. Wieniawski gave Ernst's Fantasia on Bellini's Il Pirata and wrought the audience up to the boiling point of enthusiasm; they were hardly to be restrained during the marvellous performance, and when it ended round upon round of applause mingled with cheers (!) rushed through the house. After Bach's "Chaconne," in response to the encore he gave Paganini's "Carnavale di Venezia"; and on the score of that performance I think it may be justly decreed that he is indeed a "rival to the memory of Paganini." Mlle Ormeny sang "Una Voce," and Mlle. Liebhart "Leise, Leise," from Der Freischütz, rather well, but marred the effect by her performance of "Home, Sweet Home." Rubinstein closed the concert with four transcriptions by Liszt: Rossini's "Gita in Gondola," Turkish March from the Ruins of Athens; Schubert's "Auf dem Wasser," and again the "Erl King." Every note in the last sang forth the word it is given to express far better than it is sung by very many classical singers.

This afternoon the matinee and last concert was given. The day being very clear and fine, the house was quite full. Rubinstein gave, as his opening number, three pieces of Chopin's: a Ballade (G minor), Nocturne and Scherzo. His second appearance was with some of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte and "Variations Serieuses." Wieniawski played Beethoven's fresh Romanza for the violin and a sparkling, dashing Polonaise of his own. For encore he played a "Slumber Song." In Part II. he gave us Ernst's "Elegie," a valse and a mazourka of his own; the latter was especially attractive. The Schubert "Rondo" for piano and violin was the "piece de resistance." The ladies sang their parts as usual—Miss Ormeny a trifle better in her "Non piu mesta," and Mlle Liebhart not so well in "Ruck, Ruck" and "I love my love." The last number was for Rubinstein, consisting of his "Melancholie," "Tarantelle," "Romance," and "Valse Capriccio"; and as they sparkled from his fingers they seemed as a bouquet thrown to us, saying "Au revoir."

Next Saturday Mr. Wolfsohn's second Orchestra Matinee takes place. On the 19th Theo. Thomas begins a series of concerts; and on the 27th our Handel and Haydn Society sing Elijah with Mme. Rudersdorff, Simpson and Whitney.

EUSTACE.

Music in New York—Thomas and his Orchestra at Steinway Hall.

NEW YORK, NOV. 12.—The musical events of the past fortnight have been so numerous that I can only briefly touch upon each one, although many of them deserve extended notice. To begin with the Italian Opera—which, musically, is of the least importance—we had on Monday, Oct. 28, a wretched representation of the Trovatore, with Miss Kellogg as Leonora, supported by a cast the most pitiable which I ever saw. The Prima Donna I will not criticize, as she was weighed down and depressed by the coldness of the audience, and would have sung better had her surroundings been different. On the Wednesday following Mr. Maretzek gave us a novelty in the shape of "La Favorita," with Mme. Lucca as Leonora and Sig. Abrugnedo as Fernando. Sig. Sparapani took the role of the King. On Friday, Nov. 1, we had Don Giovanni, with Mme. Lucca and Miss Kellogg. This was followed, Nov. 2, by a matinee of Fra Diavolo, an opera in which Mme. Lucca has appeared with great success. On Monday, Nov. 4, La Favorita was repeated, and Mme. Lucca gained much applause in the air, "O mio Fernando," and the duet "Vieni, ah! vieni." On Wednesday evening, Nov. 6, Miss Kellogg sang in "Crispino e la Comare." Sig. Ronconi played the cobbler to perfection. I cannot say that he sang it equally well, for his voice is long past recall. The opera, without any musical pretension, has the merit of novelty, and, if not heard too often, is an agreeable diversion. The plot, based upon a fairy tale, is, of course, full of inconsistencies, but the interest is sustained and the bright sparkling music flows smoothly through it, rarely descending to the commonplace. True, it is not an inspiration, but I have seen an audience very enthusiastic over worse music. Miss Kellogg, as Annetta, was charming in voice and manner; and, thanks to her singing and to the acting of Ronconi, who was irresistibly funny, the opera passed off very well; but the audience was the smallest I ever beheld in the Academy, and it was far easier to count the full boxes than to estimate the empty ones.

Last winter, under Strakosch's management, seats which cost four dollars were frequently sold in front of the Academy for five and six dollars. Now they can be bought there at half price, and the owners of boxes frequently make the best of a bad bargain by sending their tickets to be sold on the streets for what they will bring. Look on this picture and then on that.

The other operatic representations were as follows: Nov. 8, Nozze di Figaro, with Mme. Lucca, Miss Kellogg and Mme. Leoni Lavielle; and Nov. 9, Saturday Matinee, at which La Favorita was given for the third time.

The Concerts I will mention in the order in which they came.

First there have been two rehearsals of the Philharmonic Society, on Nov. 1st and 8th, respectively, the central portion of which was Beethoven's 7th Symphony. The other pieces are the inevitable Tannhauser overture and the Prinzessin Ilse overture (new), by Erdmannshofer. Then there was the rehearsal of the Brooklyn Philharmonic, which, with an orchestra of sixty and Carl Bergmann as conductor, rivals our New York society. The works in rehearsal here are the 5th symphony of Beethoven, Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Liszt's "Mazeppa." The first concert will take place on Saturday evening, Nov. 30, and the remaining concerts will be on Jan. 11, 1873, Feb. 8, March 29, and May 10. The concerts of the N. Y. Philharmonic Society will be given on the following dates: Saturday evenings, Nov. 16, Dec. 14, Jan. 18, 1873, Feb. 15, March 15 and April 19. Many of our amateurs will not fail to attend the concerts at the Brooklyn Academy as well those in New York.

Two concerts were given on the evening of Nov. 7. One at Steinway Hall by our excellent resident pianist, Mr. J. H. Bonawitz, whose pianoforte recitals formed so agreeable a feature in the musical record of last winter. He had the assistance of Mme. Izora Elder and the support of a full orchestra. The programme opened with Mozart's Zauberflöte overture, hardly to be recognized through the treatment which it received. This was followed by an aria from Faust, sung by Mme. Elder. The main feature of the evening was a symphony by Herr Bonawitz (No. 3, in A minor), of which I cannot speak critically, as I only heard the last movement. It seemed to be well scored, and the finale abounds in fine delicate passages which did not receive justice from the violins in the orchestra. A free use was made of the various ill-mannered brass instruments and members of the cymbal and the triangle tribe, which, in my opinion, ought to be seen and not heard. The fine pianism of Herr Bonawitz was the main attraction of the evening. He played an Introduction and Scherzo of his own, with Orchestra; Mozart's Faisie in D minor; a Rhapsodie Hongroise by Liszt (one which is seldom played here), and Chopin's Polonaise in A flat. (Does not the last selection come a little too soon after Rubinstein's performance of it?)

Herr Bonawitz's playing is characterized by a simplicity of style which is almost severe at times; a firm, clear touch, and great facility of execution, combined with a poetic fire and grace of expression which was shown best in his rendering of Mozart's Faisie. The audience was a large one.

The Bonawitz pianoforte recitals, to take place during the winter, will be three in number. The first one will come on Wednesday afternoon, Dec. 4, on which occasion Miss Antoinette Sterling will sing.

The other concert, on the same evening (Nov. 7), was given at the Academy by Mrs. Charlotte V. Winterburn (nee Huthings), who is favorably known as a singer in Oratorio. This concert was really entitled to be called "grand"—as a miscellaneous entertainment, it could hardly be surpassed. Mrs. Winterburn was assisted by Mr. Myron W. Whitney, of Boston; Herr Benno Walter, Solo Violinist to the King of Bavaria (his first appearance in America); Adolphus Lockwood, Harpist, from London, and G. W. Colby, Accompanist; but the crowning glory of all was Theo. Thomas's superb orchestra, looking as fresh as though they had not travelled half over the United States since last summer, and playing, it seemed to me, better than ever.

The overture to Tannhauser opened the programme. This was followed by the air "Que Sdegno," from the "Magic Flute," splendidly sung by Mr. Whitney. This gentleman made a marked impression by his fine voice and artistic delivery.

Herr Benno Walter followed with Spohr's long Concerto in D minor. His playing, though not remarkable for breadth of tone, evinced a fine and musicianlike spirit, and a remarkable purity of intonation, which, together with the beautiful manner in which the orchestral parts were rendered, made this concerto one of the most interesting numbers on the long programme.

Mrs. Winterburn sang Handel's lovely air, "Lascia ch'io pianga," and was warmly applauded. Selections from the "Midsummer Nights Dream" by the Orchestra and two songs by Mrs. Winterburn, which I could not remain to hear, closed the first part of the programme.

Part second opened with Weber's Oberon Overture by the Orchestra, who played also Liszt's Rakoczy March. Mrs. Winterburn sang "Ocean, thou mighty monster," very dramatically. Mr. Lockwood played "La danse des fees," by Parish Alvars. Mr. Whitney sang "The freshening breeze," by Randegger; and Herr Walter played Ernst's grand Fantaisie on "Othello," confirming the good impression he made by his first performance. The audience was larger than at the Opera on the night previous, and received an adequate return for their money, which those who attended the Opera did not get.

This brings the record up to Saturday, Nov. 9, when the first of the six Symphony Concerts to be given by Theodore Thomas took place at Steinway Hall. A glance at the hall at five minutes before 8 o'clock was all that was needful to settle the question whether these series would pay. The hall was filled to the highest gallery, and the an' all hall at the back, only used on special occasions, was thrown open to accommodate those who were unable to find seats elsewhere. The programme opened with Gluck's noble overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, played with all the fire and fervor of a company of artists. A better rendering could scarcely be possible.

Mr. Geo. L. Osgood then made his bow to us and sang the aria: "Costanze," from Mozart's Seraglio. His uncertain rendering of the recitative and a slight huskiness in his voice showed that he was suffering from nervousness; which, however, wore off when in part second of the programme he gave us five songs by Schumann, written to Lenau's Poems, namely:—

"Lied eines Schmiedes," with its curious hammer and anvil-like accompaniment; "Meine Rose;" "Kommen und Scheiden;" "Die Sennin;" and "Der Schwere Abend."

These were beautifully rendered, and the audience, although they had little relish for such solid musical food as Schumann's Songs, could not refuse an encore to the sweet voiced tenor, and in the selection with which he responded he appeared to the best advantage. The great seventh Symphony by Beethoven, in part first of the programme, was played as I have never heard it, save in the Conservatoire at Paris. From the first note of introduction to the end it received the most masterly treatment, and the beauty of the Allegretto never seemed to me so divine. This work was wisely placed just before the intermission, for we needed the repose after such sustained attention. The orchestral pieces in part second were: "Wotan's Abschied," from Wagner's "Die Walkuren," and Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz"—pieces which I will not attempt to describe. Indeed I could only say of the latter, "I know that it is ugly, but I feel that it is great."

The second Symphony Concert will be given on Saturday evening, Dec. 28, when Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony will be performed.

This week all our thoughts and plans are swallowed up in one topic of absorbing interest, and if we think of music it is the music of voices tremulous with tender feeling for a suffering city to which we are bound by every tie of sympathy and brotherhood; and we do not forget that, were we similarly afflicted, Boston would be the first to extend the right hand of fellowship.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 30, 1872.

Our readers have all heard of the Great Boston Fire. They have readily imagined, no doubt, that even our small quiet nook of journalism was not wholly undisturbed amid the wholesale ruin; and if they missed their paper of Nov. 16, they have guessed the cause. It is true the flames came very near us; had they not been stayed within a narrow street's width of our publishers, Messrs. Ditson & Co., there might have been no DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC for some time to come. As it was, our worthy printer, Mr. Spooner, was the sufferer; half of the matter for the missing number stood already in type, when the devouring monster pounced upon him, and almost in no time he was "swept out clean," his types ran molten lead, his presses collapsed under an unwonted pressure. But with courageous enterprise he has picked himself up and improvised another office, procured what types were to be got for love or money in these times, and now, after a fortnight's delay, sends us out in a new dress, new type throughout. But as you will see, he is still "out of sorts"—not in any moral or metaphorical, but in a literal, printer's, equivalent in this case to a typical, sense. You will miss varieties of type, accents, &c., and altogether you must take the present number, hurried out in such confusion, simply as a sign that we "still live." Henceforth the paper will resume its steady course.

The Harvard Symphony Concerts.

The eighth season opened on Thursday afternoon, Nov. 7,—very auspiciously from the artistic point of view, less so from the material. For this opening fell upon a day so rainy and so chilly, in the midst of the horse epidemic, that all the street cars had to be taken off, sadly to the disappointment of that large proportion of our music lovers who dwell in the suburbs. Yet there was twice as large an audience as one could expect to see at such a time, and made up of the kind of people on whom what is best in music is not wasted. All within looked genial,—the Music Hall in the soft sheen of its fresh adornment; the bronze Beethoven seemingly alive and sympathizing there in front of the majestic Organ; the inspiring presence of the intelligent and happy audience; a fine orchestra, a noble singer, and a programme to excite most pleasing expectations.

 Concert Aria, No. 5. Recit. "Ch'io mi scordi"; Andante and Rondo: "Non temer, amato bene." Mozart.
 With Piano and Orchestra. Schumann.

Mendelssohn's religious Overture to "Athalie" made a stately prelude for a grand series of concerts. The sweet, rich blending of the wind instruments in the vigorous opening choral strain at once gave assurance of sound material and discipline in what had been regarded as the least sure portion of the orchestra; and the strings on their part made the promise good. There were nine first violins (the tenth being absent), headed as usual by Mr. EICHBERG, and including Mr. Schultze, the leader, and Mr. Hamm, the valuable new member of the Quintette Club, besides Messrs. H. Suck, Ford, Allen, Torrington, &c.; eight second violins, under the old lead of the brothers Eichler; six violas, with a new life infused into them by the return of Mr. Heindl; six remarkably good 'cellos, among them Wulf Fries, Hennig [newly of the Quintette Club],

A. Suck and A. Heindl; and six strong contrabassos. Never before have we been so fortunate in our wind instruments. With Mr. Goering still for the first flute; with the rich and lovely clarionet tone of Mr. Weber, matched with a new and worthy second in Mr. Whittemore; with Kutzleb's sure and beautiful first oboe; and an admirable pair of bassoons (Eltz, happily regained, and Becher),—there is very little more to be desired, whether of tone-color, or clear execution and expressive phrasing, on the part of the gentler double quartet of the wind band; while all the brass,—the double pair of horns, the pair of trumpets, even the three trombones,—with no lack of vitality and strength, are noted for a smoother, more subdued, harmonious blending than has been characteristic of our orchestras before. We will not have the rashness to call it a great orchestra; and doubtless it is still far from perfect for one of its moderate size. But it is a great gain on the past, and may without presumption address itself to its high tasks. Mr. ZERRAHN may now feel happy in a pretty reasonable assurance that he has men to deal with by whom his intentions, and those of the composer, will for the most part be quickly understood and realized.

This first Overture made a fine impression, deepening that of last year, when it was first introduced into these Concerts. So too did the second, and the third. Schubert's to "Alfonso and Estrella," with its broad, grandiose introduction, and its bright, fascinating theme in the quick part, was all too short. It is a brilliant and exhilarating composition, uniting noble grandeur with a wholesome and vivacious buoyancy of spirits; a splendid piece of instrumentation, without any of the modern extravagance; beautiful, refreshing, henceforth ever sure to please. The vital quality and temper of the orchestra, its satisfactory ensemble, exhibited itself nowhere more palpably than in this work. The "Genoveva" Overture could be relied on as a sure card for a finale, which no one, though it has been given every season in these concerts, would be willing to lose. Uniting so much of the Schumann individuality, so much delicate, poetic sentiment and pathos, so much ever fresh romance, with an unflagging force and brilliancy, it charms likewise by perfect unity of form, directness and certainty of movement, and subtlety of texture. This too was in the main well rendered.

Beethoven's earliest Symphony, in C, had never before had place in the seventy or more programmes of the Harvard Concerts, and it was only fit that it should at last be given to complete the nine. Familiar as it once was through smaller orchestras, we think it proved more fresh and full of beauties upon this revival than many had anticipated. If it moves mainly in the smaller forms of Haydn and Mozart, and reflects their very style of thought, partakes of their naive and happy spirit, yet it shows many an intimation of the traits so grandly, wonderfully developed in his after works; the Beethoven individuality already peeps out; here is a new man, an original, all must have felt who heard its first performance. And is it not most interesting to meet for once the strong, long suffering giant, the brooding deep-souled poet, in his youthful freshness rejoicing in the beauty of the world? For one we must confess we never before half realized the loveliness of this too familiar early work. And the orchestra played it as if to them too it was a new delightful revelation in what they had considered an old story. The whole rendering was characterized by great delicacy and clearness, and good light and shade; especially the Andante with its charming variations. The only question would be whether one or two of the tempi were not taken a little too fast.

The novelty, the memorable feature of the concert was the "Ariadne" Cantata by Haydn, a composition of such dramatic progress and intensity, traversing so wide a range of emotions, from the blissful, tender dream of the deserted maiden awaking with her lover's name upon her lips, through the gradual realization of her solitude, to the calling down of heaven's vengeance on the betrayer,—containing a whole history in a single scene,—that one becomes alive to a hitherto unsuspected power in Haydn, and is inclined to think the world has met with serious loss in the destruction of those Operas of his by fire. Ariadne is supposed to be lying on a bed of moss upon the rocky isle of Naxos, just awaking from sleep. The words, superior as poetry to what we commonly find in the Italian texts to those things, invite to the largest and most varied exercise of all the powers of musical cantabile and recitative, as well as graphic instrumentation. We give the close translation, made for the programme by the singer herself, which greatly helped the understanding of the hearers.

Recitative.—Theseus, my love! where art thou?
 Ah, where art thou?

To me it seemed thou wert near me;
 But a flatterer, yet fallacious dream deceived me!

Already the heav'ns o'erspreads the rose-colored morn,
 And the grasses and flowers are tinted by the rays

That crown the brow of golden Phoebus.
 Oh spouse, oh spouse adored, whither are turned thy steps?

Perhaps, to chase the forest deer thy noble ardor called thee hence.

Oh hasten, return, beloved one.

And sweeter prey to thee I'll offer!

Thy loving Ariadne's heart that faithfully adores thee,

Ah! clasp with closer embrace to thine own,
 And let with all resplendent fire shine forth our love!

To be from thee divided for but one instant, passes all endurance.

Oh, the desire again to behold thee fills my whole soul!

All my heart yearns for thee! Come then, thou, my idol!

Largo.—Where art thou, my life's best treasure?

Who withholds thee from this fond heart?

If thou linger'st, all joy, all pleasure,

Changed to woe, for aye depart.

Oh ye gods, bend down in mercy.

Grant this pray'r to you ascending:

Let my love to me return!

Rec.—No one listens! My sad words echo but repeats!

Theseus hears me not! Theseus answers not,
 And the waves and the breezes carry hence my accents!

Andante.—Yet not distant from me ought he to be!
 Let me ascend the highest of these Alpine rocks,

From there discover him!

Allegro vivace. Recitative.—

What see I? Oh heavens! Unhappy me!

Those are the sails of the Argosy! Greeks are those yonder!

Theseus! 'T is he stands at the prow!
Am I deceiving myself? No, no, 't is no error!
He flies me! And here, all alone, abandons me!
Further hope there is not:—I am forsaken!
Theseus! Theseus! I hear me! But alas, I am raving,
The sea, the winds bear him away forever from my sight!
Ye gods, be just to me, and punish the traitor!
Ingrate! Why did I save thee from death?
How couldst thou thus cruelly traduce me, thy own promises, and all thy sacred vows?
Betrayed! Deceiver! And hast thou the heart to leave me?

Adagio.—To whom can I turn me, from whom for pity hope?

Oh—I am fainting—my strength forsakes me!
In this dread, this bitter moment,
I feel my inmost soul failing and trembling.

Andante.—Ah! how for death I am longing,

In this most fatal instant!
But to suffer these fierce torments,
The gods condemn me to live.

Allegro presto.—Woe's me! deceived, betrayed,
Earth holds no consolation!
Whom I so loved, forsakes me,
Heartless, unfaithful, cruel!

Here certainly is scope for a musician and for a great singer. Haydn has made a noble composition out of it, for him surprisingly dramatic and intense, full of variety and contrast and of delicate transitions, rich in broad, flowing melodies and in the noblest recitative, and with most beautiful, suggestive use of the full orchestra. The work as a whole has not the rounded form of the Mozart Aria; indeed scarcely any form at all; it simply shapes itself to all the ins and outs and changes of the words; continually new melodies separated by long passages of recitative, during which however the orchestra is frequently melodious; nor is there any unity of key preserved; it begins in E-flat major, a soft symphonic prelude hinting the dawn of day, and ends in an impassioned Presto in F minor; but there is plenty of poetic unity and the true modulation of emotion. Mme. Rudersdorff was equal to her arduous task, entering fully into the spirit of the work, and reproducing all its meaning, power and beauty in a style and with an effect of which we doubt if any other singer now before the world is capable. It was a noble instance of the great old art of song, which has become so rare. It is true, her voice is no longer fresh and youthful, and some things cost her obvious effort, which come out with careless ease from a young singer. But the voice is still a large and rich one in the greater part of its compass, which is very great; it still has tones of the very sweetest,—what could be more so than the long pure note with which the scene begins, calling in blissful reverie the name of "Te-seo!" Her recitative was altogether nobly expressive, now full of tenderness, now of alarm and fear, and then of burning scorn and indignation; while in those large, broad passages of pure Cantabile, her middle and lower tones had a voluminous rich diapason calibre and quality, with a significant tone coloring, more satisfactory than is hardly ever heard in a soprano singer in these days. Both melody and declamation were superb. If now and then an impassioned and emphatic high tone was a little harsh, it was easily forgiven to the mature consummate art of such a singer,—a singer who even in her singing shows how musically she includes in her conception not the voice part alone, but everything which goes to make up the whole composition, orchestral and vocal. It would be impossible for a Conductor to know such a work more thoroughly than she does. Such singing renews the tradition of the great days of song. From such a performance every singer ought to learn. And with all its intensity, all the abandon of the singer, it had the repose of Art; there was nothing overdone, nothing extravagant; the fire was there, but it was kept in strict control within the bounds of Art.—We may say all this safely, for we are not alone in our opinion. So far as we could see, or have been able to learn since, the impression on that audience was profound. Witness the glowing criticisms, fair specimens of all that have appeared, which we transcribe on our last page. We are the more moved to copy them, considering the harsh disparagement which some even of the same journals have been wont to heap upon this lady's singing ever since she was so unfortunately out of place, as every real artist could but be, in that vain-glorious Babel tower, the "Coliseum." Now she has reclaimed her true, legitimate position as an artist, and all the lovers of sincere high Art welcome her back to it.—The Mozart Aria in the second part was another instance of superb interpretation; for the air was better suited to her voice than it was to the singer of last year. The obligato pianoforte part was beautifully played by Mr. HUGO LEONHARD:—a part by no means unimportant, for Mozart wrote it, as he says upon the score, "for Mlle. Storace and me."

The second concert, Nov. 21, had a much larger audience, though not up to the mark of last year; nor could it be expected so soon after the Great Fire. The programme was as follows:

Overture to "Medea".....Cherubini.
Violin Concerto in E minor, op. 64.....Mendelssohn.
Miss Therese Liebe.

Symphony in E flat.....Mozart.
Violin Solos.....Tartini.
a. Adagio.....Mozart.
b. Minuet and Trio.....Mozart.
Overture to "The Ruler of the Spirits," ["Rubezahl"].....Weber.

The ever welcome "Medea" Overture by Cherubini, a work of pure classic beauty, and the romantic early one by Weber, full of anticipations of the wild, mysterious Freyshuetz element, as well as of fresh, fragrant melodies for flute, oboe, clarinet, were given with precision and good light and shade, and were listened to with close attention and true satisfaction. Mozart's lovely E flat Symphony, always a favorite, was more appreciated than ever; its charm is perennial. The stately introduction, in which the instrumentation sounds so full and large without the modern extra brass, followed by an Allegro in no way disappointing; the perfectly lovely Andante, with its delicious comminglings of soft reed and flute tones, and the exquisite bringing together of a first and second motive; the witching little Minuet and Trio (taken rather too fast for the clear effect of the low clarinet arpeggio); and the hilarious, airy, graceful Finale (again a whit too fast perhaps), were clearly and expressively defined, and a true Mozartean warmth of coloring suffused the whole.

The Fraulein THERESE LIEBE is a young German girl, the daughter of a musician of Strassburg, not 18 years of age. For several years she and her family have made their home in London, whither the young girl violinist was sent with a warm letter of commendation by Rossini to Sir Julius Benedict. Mme. Rudersdorff has taken a sincere artist interest in her, and has enlisted her in her American concert party. She has a fine musical organization, is wholly unspoiled by applause and unsophisticated in her musical direction, being partial to the best and loving to play Bach and the old masters of the violin better than the brilliant effect pieces. Her graceful, modest, unaffected manner and appearance, her intellectual, fine-cut features, bespeak a cordial interest at once. Her playing of the Mendelssohn Concerto was very sure and pure and delicate, showing a truly musical conception and right schooling. Her execution for one so young is very remarkable; her tone sweet and true, with slight occasional swerving, rather than very broad and powerful. Some have complained that she did not play with more fire and intensity, and have been so unjust as to compare her with the greatest of mature virtuosos of the violin. "She does not play like Wieniawski," one says! Nor does she look like him; what then? From a true standpoint of appreciation, this chaste, delicate, virginal style of playing is not a negative quality, but is to be considered as a positive virtue. The intensity, the fire, the passion, which could be only imitated and affected now, can only truly come of much experience, not of Art only, but of life. One must have suffered to be strong. Goethe has a parable which begins:

"The patient Muses would impart
To Psyche their poetic art."

It went on slowly; the teaching did not thrive, till "Love came by with look and fire, and the whole course was learned outright." For "Love" read the whole heart's experience, human life with all its great excitements and its sorrows, and the parable applies. The two small solo pieces were given with string quartet accompaniment. The Adagio by Tartini is a choice strain of sweet religious melody, which was beautifully expressed; and the bright, piquant Mozart Minuet—from one of his Divertimentos for an orchestra of strings and two horns,—with its tripping staccato, was so neatly, tellingly performed, that the young lady had to come back and repeat it.

The third concert comes next Thursday (Dec. 5), when another young lady of Mme. Rudersdorff's troupe, Miss ALICE FAIRMAN, contralto, will sing Bach's Cradle Song from the Christmas Oratorio, with orchestral accompaniments as completed by Robert Franz, besides some choice old Italian melodies. Miss ANNA MEHLIG, too, will play the Liszt Concerto in E flat, a Nocturne by Chopin, and a grand Prelude and Fugue by Bach. The Overtures will be Mozart's to "La Clemenza di Tito" (first time for many years) and Mendelssohn's to "Ruy Blas." The Symphony will be a new one (here) by Gade, No. 5, in D minor, of which the instrumentation is unique in the employment of the Piano as a member of the orchestra. (Possibly, however, after rehearsal it may be deemed wiser to substitute the same composer's second Symphony, in E.)

And now come THEODORE THOMAS'S "Unrivalled Concerts," to lend a musical halo to the coming week! Besides these, the Harvard Concerts with their Public Rehearsals, and the Messiah at Christmas, little is certain in the way of music before New Year. The great fire proves a damper (pardon the Hibernicism) upon concert enterprises. Many have retired from the field. Whether even Rubinstein will venture back at present remains to be seen. The Matinees of Messrs. Leonhard and Eichberg are postponed,—we trust not for long,—the lovers of such music cannot well afford to go without it; and in dark times we need the heartening religious cheer of real divine music.

In the scramble to get out a paper without the printer's usual conveniences, types too large, &c., we have entirely miscalculated our space. This we discover when it is too late for long, monopolizing articles to move up, or move out, and make room for other matters equally entitled to a place. Some interesting chamber concerts of the Conservatories, some good Organ concerts, a word more about Rubinstein, later Correspondence, &c., &c., are crowded out for the present.

What they say of the First Symphony Concert.

[From the Daily Advertiser.]

The cantata was the novelty of the day, it never having been given here before. It is a work of great breadth and power, and quite out of Haydn's general style, save in the regularly formed melodies, which are marked with his peculiar terms of expression, and his now old-fashioned final cadences. It is remarkable in its impassioned intensity, and its instrumentation, in its fulness, vigor and dramatic fire. Irresistibly reminds one of the thoughtful and solid scoring of Gluck. The work, though brief, is a masterpiece, and were it not for a certain faint breath of quaintness that now and then appears, it is as fresh as if it had been written to-day. The recitatives are unusually fine, and are strikingly impressive in their sympathy with the sentiment of the text. . . . Madame Rudersdorff interpreted this exacting and expressive work in a style whose nobility and breadth it is almost impossible to describe. It was one of the most superb pieces of musical declamation to which we have ever listened. There is no living singer we can call to mind who can give so grand a coloring to this work as it received at Madame Rudersdorff's hands. In its dramatic force, intensity of expression, clearness of conception, unity of design and the extraordinary vigor and intellectual refinement that distinguished the whole performance, it was an effort never to be forgotten by those who were privileged to hear it. The earnestness and enthusiasm which Madame Rudersdorff brought to bear upon her work, her evident love and admiration for the composition, her conscientious care and artistic fervor, were as remarkable as they were above all praise. In her rendition of this fine work, Madame Rudersdorff proved she was one of that race of great lyric artists, whose wonderful dramatic powers have become a tradition, and of whom now there is no representative save herself. The voice is certainly worn, but the power, expression, fire and intelligence of the artist are almost in their pristine vigor, and enabled her to give one of the most brilliant, satisfying and intellectual vocal performances to which we have listened for years. It affords us great pleasure to be able to speak thus favorably of Madame Rudersdorff's effort of yesterday afternoon, as we had not previously heard her in that class of music in which she excels, and had consequently misjudged the extent of her powers. Her singing of Mozart's concert air was marked by chasteness of style and purity of sentiment, and was, in point of taste, and in breadth of style and sympathy with the composer, a fitting pendant to her previous grand effort.

The orchestral part of the programme deserves high commendation. Mendelssohn's "Athalie" overture was given with great clearness and beauty of expression. The delightful Beethoven Symphony, with its exuberance of animal spirits, its delicious youth and freshness, its wealth of melody and gorgeous coloring, was an exquisite feature in the concert. In this work we see Beethoven before he had entirely emancipated himself from the influence of Haydn and Mozart. The whole symphony was played with spirit and delicacy by the orchestra, whose heart seemed to be in its work. The slow movement in particular was charmingly interpreted, and the care and attention that seemed to inspire the performers one and all throughout, resulted in a highly finished and artistic performance. The "Alfonso and Estrella" overture was vigorously rendered, but it has never been a favorite with us. Schubert does not seem to have worked here with his usual freedom and enthusiasm. There are some fine outbursts of orchestralism, but the principal themes are weak and commonplace. It sounds as though the composer was jaded and uninspired when he set about it, and completed it as a necessary task rather than as a labor of love. The glorious "Genoveva" overture, which brought the concert to a close, was brilliantly and effectively played, its picturesque instrumentalism and careful working receiving every justice at the hands of the orchestra. The opening concert was a complete artistic success, and proved a noble prelude to the series to come.

[From the Globe.]

About the quality of the instrumental performance there could hardly be two opinions. The corps have certainly gained in every good quality and have largely corrected their faults, if they are to be judged by their work of yesterday. A general strengthening and inspiring of the orchestra seem to have taken place; the "attack" of the stringed instruments is cleaner and sharper than we have ever known it, and an obvious advance has been made both in precision and vitality of style. In the overture to "Athalie," the brass instruments were put severely to the proof in a number of long and trying passages, and did their work with a cleanliness and a brilliancy to which we have not been too much accustomed in the past.

The programme was admirable, both in the intrinsic excellencies of its numbers and the agreeableness of their contrasts. The symphony—granting all that may be said of its comparative deficiency in the stronger and deeper beauties of Beethoven's later and more completely original style—is a treasury of choice things, of sweet, pure and beautiful music which charms the senses and delights the fancy, if it does not stir the soul. The fresh loveliness of the andante, and especially of its exquisite second melody, can scarcely be matched outside of Mozart and of the Master himself, and the minuetto ranks with the best music of its order in brilliant ingenuity and abundant life. In the performance of the symphony the orchestra acquitted itself admirably, distinguishing nicely in the styles of the different movements but not failing to convey a sense of unity in the whole. In the overture to "Alfonso and Estrella," however, their work showed the best of its warmth and power.

Madame Rudersdorff surprised even the warmest of her admirers by her renderings of the Haydn cantata and the concert aria by Mozart. The former of these works was presented for the first time in Boston, and so abounded in beauties as almost to confuse and puzzle the enjoying faculties of the listener. We must confine ourselves, however, to briefly mentioning the great dramatic power and propriety of the music, which touched the heart even more than its sweetness pleased the ears. Madame Rudersdorff in rendering the number displayed a splendid breadth and finish of style and a degree of dramatic insight which would have been worthy of the first of artists. The emotions of the cantata, which pass from the fanciful dreamings of an enamored maiden through almost every form of anxiety, alarm, longing, the grief and agony of insulted love, and, finally, of despair and dissolution, demand the highest power of passionate expression as well as the nicest adaptation in the expression of shades of feeling; and Madame Rudersdorff cannot be more highly praised than by being declared equal to the exigencies of the work. The listener even forgot to be displeased with the hard tones which now and then exhibited the wear and tear to which her voice has been exposed. The aria by Mozart was given with great delicacy and tenderness of feeling and with nice taste.

[From the Commonwealth.]

The elements, although very unpropitious, did not prevent the attendance of one of the usual large and select audiences that a Harvard concert invariably attracts. The conspicuous feature of the programme, and a real novelty, was the cantata, "Ariana a Naxos," by Haydn, sung by Madame Erminia Rudersdorff.

We are under great obligations to the lady and to Mr. Dwight for the opportunity of hearing this superb work, which exhibits the composer's genius in a new phase. For a piece of its length we know of no other contemporaneous work of its class comparable with it in dramatic fire, nobility of style and depth of sentiment. A fine translation of the text made by Madame Rudersdorff, printed upon the programmes, made the spirit of the music at once familiar and comprehensible. The artist's rendering was superb beyond comparison. The music presents singular and intricate difficulties in its recitative and in its contrasted movements. From the opening note expressive of Ariadne's hopeful waking to the despairing gloom of the tragic finale, the artist's conception was impressively majestic, and her rendering magnificent in the grandeur of its declamation, the breadth and beauty of coloring, and the refined delicacy of expression. We are more than pleased to record the unequivocal triumph of Madame Rudersdorff in the highest sphere to which a vocalist can attain, and one in which she has not had previous opportunity to exhibit the splendid developments of her best powers. The Mozart aria in the second part was comparable with Madame Rudersdorff's previous effort in breadth of interpretation and purity of style.

The orchestral portions afforded a rare treat, of which the most delectable dainty was the Beethoven symphony No. 1 in C.

LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Be sure you're right. Serio Comic Song. Youker. 30
3. D to f. "This maxim always keep in view."
A comico-moral affair. Good music to a good saying.
- Jeannette. 3. F to g. Tully. 30
"Who has eyes of deepest blue?
Who has hair of golden hue?"
- Kissing at the Door. 3. Bb to g. Tully. 30
"I'm sure you've staid quite long enough
I've told you so before."
Two fine ballads, the first pretty as Jeannette's blue eyes, and the second neatly comic.
- Good Night to thee. 2. Bb to f. Bliss. 30
A pleasing good-night song.
- Baby's Garments. Song and Chorus. 2. Bb to f. Gorham. 30
"Little shoes, whose earthly wearer Star-crowned, treads the shining shore."
- Hark! The Herald Angels Sing. Anthem for Christmas. 3. G. Wilson. 80
It is time to practice for Christmas, and these ever sweet words, with their new and bright music are just right for the occasion.
- Do you remember? Song and Cho. 2. Eb to e. Webster. 35
"Do you remember, Kitty,
What you said one year ago?"
The words, by "Hope Ardor" are very neat, and the whole very cheerful and pretty.
- I waited for the Twilight. Lithograph Title. 3. Albites. 40
"He said he came to find me
Do you really think he did?"
One of Miss Ridgeway's songs, and can hardly fail to be a favorite, if it is not one already.
- Ah! were I but a fitting Bee. 3. G to g. Abt. 35
"All day and night I'd ceaseless sing
The glorious budding charms of Spring."
Has German and English words; and in addition to being a good song for everybody, is excellent for young singers.
- Kitty and Ben. 2. C to f. Webster. 30
"As Kitty was walking one morning so early
When over the meadow came Whistling Ben."
A charming, merry half-comic Irish ballad.

Instrumental.

- Down in the Coal Mine Waltz. 3. D. Knight. 30
The way that songs and airs become the popular ones, is mysterious enough; but the Coal Mine is now one of the chief favorites, and this instrumental arrangement will be acceptable.
- Birdie's Song. Nocturne. 4. Eb. Devlin. 35
A very pretty "warbling" melody, and is graceful throughout.
- Silver Ripples. E. Mack. each. 30
The Ripples are 20 in number, and are all just the things for Teachers and Pupils. At present we notice,
- No. 3. Charming Lily Waltz. 2. F. 4. Starry Night Galop. 2. G.
Both are very neat, melodious and useful.
- Galop Militaire. The Review. 3. G. Wand. 40
The Galop has a general brilliant military style with some of the "calls" of a review, and is novel and pleasing.
- 1001 Nights Waltzes. Violin & Piano. Strauss. 75
Kuentler Leben (Artist Life). " " 75
Loreley Rhein-Klange. " " 75
Life let us cherish. " " 75
The everywhere popular Strauss Music, arranged for Violin and Piano, in which form it will be more brilliant than for piano alone. Belongs to a set of pieces called "Echoes from the Ball Room."

FROM GOETHE.

Poems are colored window glasses.

Look into a church from the market square:
Nothing but gloom and darkness there!
Shrewd Sir Phillistine sees things so:
Well may he narrow and captious grow,
Who all his life on the outside passes.

But come, now, and inside we'll go!
Now round the holy chapel gaze;
'Tis all one many-colored blaze:
Story and emblem, a pictured maze,
Flash by you:—'tis a noble show.
Here feel as sons of God baptized,
With hearts exalted and surprised!

The sister Nine full early chose
To Psyche their poetic art
With patient method to impart.
Pure soul! her most of song was prose!
Not thrillingly rang out her lyre
E'en in the fairest summer night;
Till Love came by with look and fire,
And the whole course was learned outright.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Reminiscences of Mendelssohn.

BY HIS ENGLISH PUPIL.

A quarter of a century has elapsed since the death of FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTOLDY. Each succeeding anniversary of this sad event finds his name and his works in greater repute, and any details of his life and character, both as an artist and as a man, are eagerly sought for as interesting not only to the musician, but to the large body of amateurs, whose admiration of the greatest composer since Beethoven is as genuine as it is unbounded. Having for some years (1832 to 1847) had the privilege of Mendelssohn's friendship, and of constant and personal intercourse with him, I have been often solicited to give some account of that period, and I now venture to lay before my readers the following slight sketch of the happiest portion of my artistic life. I do so with the hope that the interest of my subject may in some degree excuse the many imperfections in the execution of my task.

Before, however, commencing my observations upon Mendelssohn's life and works, it may not be out of place briefly to glance at the extraordinary progress that Music, both as a Science and an Art, has made since the birth of JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH, and to comment upon the gradual succession of great men, whose works and influence have raised them far above all other composers of their time, and who in a short space of one hundred and fifty years have placed the Art of Music on a pedestal quite equal to that of Painting and Poetry. Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, are the five men to whom I would especially point as having an undoubted right to the title of "Kings of Music," and to their works and consequent influence, the Art of Music is indebted for the position it now occupies. If to these names are added those of Weber, Schubert, Spohr and Mendelssohn, there will be a total of nine, and I do not think I shall be accused of exaggeration if I assert that it is to these nine great men that the world is indebted for the greater part of the enjoyment and instruction that has been derived from the practice of music since Bach first became known at the commencement of the 18th century. If it is asked why I name only nine great men, and why all these should be selected from one nation? I would reply that, though in France, Cherubini, Auber, Herold, Adam, Berlioz have lived; though England has produced Purcell, Boyce, Arne, Webb, Callcott, Wm. Horsley; though Italy was as much the cradle of Music as of Painting, and can boast, besides her glorious church composers, of Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, Mercadante and others, and though even Germany will never forget Gluck, Spontini, Meyerbeer, Marschner, &c., yet these men great as they were, have exclusively devoted themselves to one style of composition; in France, Germany and Italy, to operatic music; in England to Church and Glee writing; whereas the nine I have selected applied themselves to, and succeeded in every known form of musical composition, from the sublimest sacred works to the lightest dance music. This great versatility therefore entitles them to more consideration than those who have only been distinguished in one branch of their art, and it is for this reason that I would urge their claims to the high position in which I conceive they should be placed; and if it has happened that all these nine men were from one nation, Bach, Handel, Spohr, Mendelssohn from the North; Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Weber, from the South of Germany, it can only be replied that Art has no country, and that musicians must be judged by their works, and the power they have asserted on the minds of their hearers, without reference to the nation from which they sprang. I should be far too long in arriving at the immediate object of this paper, if I allowed myself to dwell at any length on the individuality of each of the nine composers I have named; but as it will be necessary to relate the extremely happy circumstances under which Mendelssohn lived and worked, so will it not be out of place to refer to the painful struggles and difficulties of at least five of his compeers, the beauty of whose works may almost be said to be enhanced by the troubles under which they were produced. JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH, by far the most scientific musician the world has yet seen, commenced his career under the most painful circumstances. His elder brother endeavored by every means to quench his genius for music, and by denying him light at the only period of the day which he could devote to self-instruction, laid the foundation of an eye disease which ended in total blindness. In addition to this, his worldly means were of the smallest, and the burden of a very large family must have greatly added to his pecuniary anxieties. In spite of these obstacles he lived the most industrious of lives, and not only produced the most incredible number of works, all of which, be they large or small, are immortal, but he educated five of his sons to be most excellent musicians, and thus proved his name to be a veritable "Bach," or stream, of the profoundest depth and clearness.

* No mention, then of SCHUMANN? At least as worthy of a place among the "nine," as Spohr!—Ed.

HANDEL's early life was full of troubles. He wandered from one Italian town to another producing operas, and certainly making a name, but it was not until after he was fifty years of age that he struck out that path of Oratorio writing which has made him immortal; and though at his death he left a large fortune, yet even in England his losses caused him more than one bankruptcy.

HAYDN, to gain instruction, was compelled to perform menial service for his first master Porpora, who compelled him to black his boots and brush his clothes in return for a very small modicum of teaching; and even when in the service of Prince Esterhazy, his position for many years was little better than that of a lacquey. The whole course of MOZART's life was beset with troubles. The Archbishop of Salzburg, into whose service he entered at the age of 16, seems to have delighted in plaguing the composer's life with every species of petty tyranny, and when at last he broke through his toils, and as it were escaped to Vienna, his greatness raised him up hosts of enemies, and his good nature, his kindness in assisting others, and his genial temperament and love of society, brought him into so much pecuniary difficulty that his funeral expenses had to be defrayed at the cost of the parish in which he lived.

The saddest case of all, however, was that of BEETHOVEN. Although his father seems to have been a very morose, hard-hearted man, yet being himself a musician he soon discerned the dawning genius of his son, and gave him every facility for learning the first principles of his art. At an early age he went to Vienna, studied under Albrechtsberger and Haydn, and it was pronounced by Mozart on hearing him extemporize: "The world will hear of that young man." Each succeeding year proved the truth of this prophecy; but towards the beginning of 1800 the dreadful malady of deafness commenced and increased daily, and for the last twenty years of his life, till 1827, when he died, Beethoven never heard a note of his music, and excepting by the means of sight, was quite unable to conceive the effect his sublime inspirations had on his hearers. So great a calamity is unexampled in the annals of the Art, and if anything could raise the opinion of such a man's works, it would surely be the knowledge that in spite of the direst trial that could befall a musician, his indomitable will, courage and industry triumphed over a misfortune which would have crushed many others, and caused them to succumb to the evil, without seeking a remedy for it in the exercise of the talent entrusted to them.

SCHUBERT during his life time appears to have been known more as a song writer than as a composer devoting himself to the higher branches of his art. The last few years however have proved the fallacy of this opinion, and the resuscitation of Symphonies, Sonatas, Quartets, Overtures, Operas, Masses, &c., has proved beyond dispute the right of this great man to the place he most deservedly occupies. WEBER's comparatively short life was sorely tried by domestic troubles and constant sickness caused by pulmonary disease, and yet he struggled against both, and in all branches of the art proved himself worthy of a high place in the musical Walhalla. A similar position will surely be allotted to SPOHR. I look forward to the time when this truly great man's works will be more appreciated than they are at present; for not only as the greatest violinist of his day, but as a composer of the utmost individuality (he may be said to have invented the "Chromatic School" of writing) his works, though excessively difficult to imitate, are most worthy of study, being full of most lovely melody clothed in superb harmonies, in many instances quite reaching sublimity.—I have now at length arrived at the immediate subject of this paper, and if I have been somewhat lengthy in doing so, I trust that it will be remembered that my object was to show that a musical succession of great men have been raised up one after the other, during a period of a century and a half; that these great men have, so to speak, kept the artistic faith "pure and undefiled" in spite of the greatest difficulties, and that Mendelssohn, a true disciple of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven, followed most worthily in the glorious steps of his predecessors, and that at any rate, for the present, he closes the list of great composers, for in a cosmopolitan sense, with his death and that of Spohr, the race became extinct. Let it be hoped that the fiftieth anniversary of this sad occurrence may find a successor placed on the throne. Since 1847, the interregnum continues.

It is by no means my design to attempt anything approaching to a life of my friend and master. Some day this will be written by far more competent hands than mine. Various attempts have already been made, but the most valuable contribution exists in Mendelssohn's own letters, one portion translated by Lady Wallace, and the earlier account of his boyhood, recently published under the editorship of his son, Dr. Carl Mendelssohn, Professor in Heidelberg. It may suffice to state that FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTOLDY was born in Hamburg, on February 8d, 1809, and was the son of an eminent banker in Berlin, and the grandson of Moses Mendelssohn, the celebrated Jewish Philosopher. This learned man was possessed of very liberal opinions, and caused his children to be brought up in the Christian faith, and consequently Felix's father was only of Jewish descent, and in religion belonged to the Lutheran Church. I well recollect the old man. He dined at my father's house at Kensington, near London, at the time his son's reputation was daily increasing. On being congratulated on his son's success (this was after "St. Paul" had appeared) I remember his saying: "I am very unfortunate; I am the son of a great man and the father of a great man; I really believe I am the man who, sitting between two stools, has fallen to the ground." With such parents (his mother was also a most excellent person) no pains or expense were spared in the education of their children. Felix had every advantage that money and position could procure. Moscheles, Berger and Hummel were his pianoforte instructors. Zelter (Goethe's friend and correspondent) undertook his musical and theoretical education; he learned Latin and Greek so as to translate their classics; he exhibited great talent for drawing and to almost the last day of his life delighted in sketching. My sister has in her possession a drawing, from memory, of my father's house at Kensington, which is wonderfully executed. From the age of seven years he began to compose, and although it may be a fair subject of question as to the advisability of publishing his early works, as has been done by Novello & Co., yet they are so far interesting that they show the extraordinary precocity of the boy, a precocity only perhaps excelled by Mozart. But Mozart had none of Mendelssohn's advantages; from his earliest years he was hawked about England and France by his father for the purpose of money making; whereas Mendelssohn, although in many respects the idol of his family, was always under the judicious control of loving but sensible parents, who afforded their son every opportunity for study and the improvement of his wonderful powers, without heedlessly parading his gifts before a general public, always prone to exaggerate youthful talent, and to applaud the system of forcing a genius, which, except in very few instances, is more harmed than benefitted by the process.

In the summer of 1832 I saw Mendelssohn for the first time. I was then a mere child barely ten years old, but I well recollect the occasion. My father's house was the rendezvous of all great artists both English and foreign, and invitations were immediately given to all who either brought letters or were introduced to my father by his numerous professional friends. My father himself, the most distinguished Glee writer and soundest musician that England has yet produced, was the most genial host, and it is to his constant desire to collect around him all that was good and great in his own profession, as well as the cream of the painters and literary men of the time, that his children owed the privilege of seeing all those whose genius and talent so largely contributed to the art progress of England since the commencement of the century. Thus among the musicians constantly at the house, were Moscheles, Hummel, Paganini, Mendelssohn, Spohr, Thalberg, Benedict, Sir George Smart, Mr. Ncat, Mrs. Anderson, and many others; amongst the painters, Sir Augustus Calcott (my mother's uncle), Sir Thomas Lawrence, F. R. A., Collins, Wilkie, Etty, Redgrave, Mulready, Webster, Stone, Dyce, Sir W. Boxall, Uwins, &c. Our most intimate friends in literature were Dr. Rosen, the celebrated Oriental scholar, Carl Klingemann, Secretary to the Hanoverian Embassy, Mr. H. F. Chorley, Hogarth, &c., &c.; and of engineering celebrities, we constantly saw the Brunels, father and son, the latter having married in 1836 my oldest sister. Thus I may truly say that I and my family were constantly surrounded by an atmosphere of art, literature and science; and to this fact is of course traceable the great love of Music and Painting which seems almost hereditary amongst us.

My father was always anxious to promote and to encourage our childish amusements, and at Christmas we invariably had a performance of a play written and acted by ourselves. I believe there are three of these pieces written chiefly by myself, still in my mother's possession, but the last was the most ambitious of all. It was a melodramatic Opera called the "Magician." I wrote the words of the songs and the dialogue; my youngest sister, Sophy, composed the music, and my brother John Calcott Horsley, now a Royal Academician, painted the scenes. Of my own performance as a disciple of Grub Street, I recollect little or nothing beyond a keen sense of having perpetrated fearful doggerel; but I well remember that the music, especially an Overture in B minor, and some melodramatic interludes were especially effective, and, knowing her great natural gifts, it has always been a source of regret to me that my sister would never study the theory of music. Had she done so, I am convinced she would have ranked high amongst the English female composers; (there are only three that I am aware of, Miss Kate Loder, Mrs. Tom Taylor and Miss Macaroni); for in addition to her undoubted creative talent, had she chosen to improve it, she is by far the best amateur pianist even now to be found in London. My brother's scene painting was also much praised on this occasion, and he has since amply fulfilled all the promises of his youth by a constant supply of most talented pictures, the production of which has placed him in a high place amongst his fellow artists.

But what have all these family details to do with Mendelssohn? In the summer musical season of 1832 Mendelssohn arrived in London. He had previously, I think in 1829, been for a short time in the English metropolis, but it was in 1832 that his music was first played, and his magnificent Piano and Organ playing first became known to the British public. His Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and his Concerto in G minor were produced during this year, and the first concert at which he appeared as a composer, a pianist and a conductor, showed, as has been before stated, that a legitimate successor to Beethoven had appeared, to preach the true faith of real music. During this season, the first of many brilliant ones of which Mendelssohn was the hero, he several times visited my father's house. At one of these visits the music of the "Magician" was shown him, and as a great favor he begged that a special performance might be given. It was then midsummer, and the heat was very great, but my father and mother immediately gave their consent, and a grand performance took place in exactly the same manner as at the first production the previous Christmas. About that time the Chevalier Neukomm, a talented man in every respect but music, but who imagined himself a great composer, was deluging London with second rate songs, the words chiefly by Proctor, better known as Barry Cornwall. Amongst these was one, worthless as music, called "King Death was a rare old fellow." It occurred to my brother to paint some scenes illustrative of the various incidents imagined in this poem, and my youngest sister represented the principal character in a manner which proved she possessed considerable histrionic as well as musical talent. This representation was given as an afterpiece to the "Magician." Although I was a child at the time, I never shall forget Mendelssohn's delight at the performance both of the melodrama and of the afterpiece. It was a grand thing to witness the varied expression of his beautiful face; but the greatest treat of all was after supper, when, the temporary stage having been cleared away, he sat down to the grand piano and electrified all by an extemporaneous performance on the themes contained in my sister's music. Such playing, such ingenuity, and such a display of marvellous musical memory, had never been heard before, and yet it was only the first of many similar and greater triumphs.

Goethe's Songs.

[From a Note to Translations of "Select Minor Poems of Goethe and Schiller." Boston, 1839.]

A song is but a breath. It came out whole, just as it is, as much a mystery to the poet as to any one. Its dress cannot be torn away from its substance; the rhythm, the tones, the coloring, the imagery, the very length or shortness of it, are determined by a sort of inward necessity—that nicer instinct, by which the soul, in all its genuine productions, instantly chooses out of Nature whatever will serve it for a language. A song is a feeling which has found utterance in a beautiful form, and satisfied itself. The form is not the container of the spirit of a song; the form is thoroughly instinct with the spirit, and, in fact, grew out of it. The spirit, therefore, or essence of a lyric piece cannot be transfused out of one form into another. Imitation always fails, and would, even if it were possible to effect an exact literal copy. The translator's only hope, then, is to reproduce, to reoriginate, to repeat, as near as may be, in himself, the very experience in which the song first had its birth.

Goethe's songs are all occasional poems. They are the poet's diary, written in beautiful emblems. A stanza, in itself apparently trifling, a mere breath of melody, stands over more than is fathomed at a glance. A deep background of real experience lies behind them all. The mightier inward workings, whence these drops of beauty are distilled, we do not see. Similar experience, to which any hint is enough, must be the key to their full meaning; and yet to all, more or less, they speak by their mere melody, which, like the sweet wink of Nature, tells us there is meaning, but never tells how much. It is said to be one capital secret of master-artists, that they "paint deep;" they lay on color over color, to produce one simple color to the eye. In copying from Nature, they paint more than the surface which is seen, but also much beneath it, which is not seen. Thus the deep blue sky, which looks so real in the best landscapes, is, in fact, coat upon coat of various colors, the blue last and outermost. So sincere is all true Art; it must know something of the depths, before it can effectually copy the shows of Nature. Such pictures, like Nature herself, present an inexhaustible novelty and depth; for both are living creations of the spirit, and not vulgar manufactures. The same thing holds not of Painting alone, but of all Art—poetry, literature, and whatever pretends to creative genius. The superficial, over-refined literature of the day may be said to want reality and background; it tells all that is meant, and more, and so wants the look of life. In the works of genius, what is written is but the sign of vastly more, concealed, which cannot be spoken. It is eminently so with Goethe. A long study of the whole man—not a criticising, but a simple and trustful study—finally makes every little rhymed trifle interesting, as unaccountably so as the favorite tunes of boyhood. One is surprised, looking over his works, that he should have preserved, with such avaricious fondness, scraps and trifles of every sort, which to the indifferent reader stand for nothing. He seems to have cherished every line left from his pen, as if they were his children. The fact is, these lines are all realities. One who has long read Goethe, reads with perfect confidence that everything he finds, however minute, is something real and significant, or it would not have been there.

The habit of embodying all his experiences in emblems, of turning his life into poetry, joys and glooms alike,—redeeming the former from their transitoriness, to shine as ideal stars above him, cheering his Present with the best of the Past,—converting the latter into triumphs, making the memory of sorrows sweet, seems to have been his strong tendency from childhood. His mother wrote of him, "My son has said, that when anything lies heavy on us, we must work it off; and that whenever he has had a sorrow, he has got a song out of it." Poetry was his life. He saw, as soon as he turned himself to writing his own biography, that poetry is by no means the least real part of history, and that, in fact, it is the imagination which writes histories; and he entitled his Memoirs "Fiction and Truth out of my Life"—Dichtung und Wahrheit aus meinem Leben.

Here we have the great charm of Goethe's songs, as well as of all he wrote. It is the poetry of experience; the poetry of everyday life; the poetry of the Present, and of memory and hope as part of the actual Present. Hence their freshness and reality. Hence the author's own fondness for them: if he does not love them, who should? A true song the poet feels to be no property or manufacture of his; he receives it gratefully as a gift, as it springs from his own wondering brain, and he hastens with eager joy to impart it to his fellows.

Trusting his own experience in this way, and living in the Now, in full faith that it is good, because it is, he, more than almost any man, solved the great problem of finding the Ideal in the Actual. Total occupation of himself, heart and soul, in the object nearest him,—living in it, and identifying himself with it for the time,—left no room for sick yearnings, made each little sphere a world, each moment an eternity. This is evidently what he meant by "living in the Whole," by finding "All in One, and One in All." It seems to have been his mission, like Wordsworth's to reveal to us the poetry of this very world around us, and to present us with fresh flowers of poetry, of no hot-house growth, but from the true soil of Nature, our common inheritance—beautiful witnesses and pledges of life's higher meanings, which preach to man that here or nowhere is his heaven; that here grow the flowers of Paradise. Wordsworth's nature, however, seems often too intentional; in him the reflecting philosopher predominates often over the simple bard. In Goethe it is Nature herself who speaks.

This habit of living in the Present with such a child's interest easily explains the "many-sidedness" of the mind, which shows itself in the wonderful variety of these little poems, as in his whole life. Each song is an embodied mood, a little world in itself; and from one to another we pass, as it were, into a new being, into the atmosphere of another mind. Nor is it easy for the genial reader to admit the common remark, which attributes all this to the artistic habits of the man, as if he viewed each thing, each human interest, nay, each inward feeling, only with the æsthetic sense of an artist, seeking to represent it as it is, himself coolly above all interest in any thing. On the contrary, he will imagine that this was the most natural thing in the world with Goethe, and that a hearty interest in all things—such true interest in one thing always sending the mind with fresh interest to another—was the secret of his Art. It has been said that he let his Art correct his inspiration, when his inspiration should have corrected his Art. It were simpler to suppose that his Art was his inspiration.

As it regards outward form and beauty, these pieces are distinguished for the characteristic above named, as essential to a true lyric, namely, that perfect identity of form and substance, so that one cannot be lost without the other. Some of them remind us of the songs of Shakspeare, by their simplicity of sentiment, by the small quantity of thought in them, and the strange charm with which they haunt us notwithstanding—wild Æolian harp snatches, which melt into air, while the hearer translates them into words. His love-songs, by their tenderness, whether gay or sad, and their sincere depth, which seems unwillingly betrayed, win us to their mood, like those of Burns. They are among the best poems for music of modern times, and are the favorite themes of German composers. Zelter, particularly, composed a great part of Goethe's Songs and Ballads, and entered warmly into their spirit. They discussed principles of Art and worked together, the Muses of Poesy and Harmony presiding over their joint labors. Far more completely have Goethe's songs and ballads yielded up their essential music to such inspired tone-poets as Schubert, Schumann, Robert Franz. To such music the translator has been sometimes not a little indebted. The verbal form seemed to defy translation; but being held some time in solution in this subtler element of music, it shaped itself again in his own language more readily. Walking about with the melody ringing through him, while he pondered the sentiment, a literal imitation came out in a manner quite spontaneous and unmechanical.

In point of diction, their style is the absence of all style. There is never a word too much; and those used so completely answer the end, that one cannot imagine others in their place, or that there could have been any choice of words. Brief, definite, simple, and transparent, they just transmit to you the mood or sentiment, while of the words themselves you never think. The verses "To the Moon" are a good instance; the thoughts, images, and words, are of the simplest, but the verses seem steeped in moonlight,—they are an embodied sensation.

But all this is better said in Mr. Carlyle's preface to the fourth volume of his "German Romance."

"Goethe is nowhere more entirely original, more fascinating, more indescribable, than in his smaller poems. One quality which very generally marks them, particularly those of a later date, is their peculiar expressiveness, their fulness of meaning. A single thing is said, and a thousand things are indicated. They are spells which cleave to our memory, and by which we summon beautiful spirits from the vasty deep of thought. Often, at the first aspect, they appear commonplace, or altogether destitute of significance; we look at the lines on the canvas, and they seem careless dashes, mere random strokes representing nothing, save the caprice of their author; we change our place, we shift and shift, till we find the right point of view; and all at once a fair figure starts into being, encircled with graces and light charms, and by its witcheries attracting heart and mind. In his songs, he recalls to us those of Shakspeare; they are not speeches, but musical tones; the sentiment is not stated in logical sequences, but poured forth in fitful and fantastic suggestions; they are the wild wood-notes of the nightingale; they are to be sung, not said." J. S. D.

Schumann's Overture, "Genoveva."

[To the Editor of the London "Musical World."]

SIR,—This overture, to the only opera which Schumann ever attempted, was composed in the year 1847, and stands as Opus 81 in the catalogue of his works. It is not built upon the themes of the opera, like those of Don Giovanni, Der Freischütz, William Tell or Leonora (indeed it was completed before the opera itself was begun), but appears to be an attempt to portray the general spirit of the story, more after the model of Beethoven's overtures to Egmont and Fidelio. The story is one which, in some form or other, exists in almost every nation and language. Genoveva is married to a knight, who is compelled to leave her and go to the wars. They are tenderly attached. His absence is taken advantage of by a friend to attempt the ruin of the wife. Failing in this, he has recourse to lies, and accuses Genoveva to her husband of infidelity. The husband, furious, orders her to be turned out of her castle, and left to perish in the woods. Here their child is born, and nourished by a doe. The husband returns, and while hunting in the forest encounters first the child and then his wife; an explanation takes place, and Genoveva is restored to her home and happiness.

In what measure this story of passion and distress is reflected in Schumann's music every hearer will judge for himself. To me the sombre Introduction, with its sharp dissonances and plaintive violin figure, well expresses the inconsolable grief of Genoveva in her lonely banishment; while the Allegro, in the restless unhappiness of its principal subject—the cheerful melody given out by the horns, and repeated by the flutes, oboes and clarinets—the charming second subject—the sudden and striking changes of key, and the exulting joy of the conclusion, reflect forcibly the anguish of the innocent sufferer, her occasional gleams of hope, and her final triumphant return to her former happiness. The overture abounds with fine points, and is a truly original and characteristic work. A. M.

A Card from Mr. Charles Mathews.

SIR,—Will you oblige me by giving publicity to the following note, which explains itself? I am, sir, your obedient servant,
Gaiety Theatre, Oct. 15. C. J. MATHEWS.

"Mr. Charles Mathews presents his compliments to the whole human race, and begs to state that, much as he loves his fellow-creatures, he finds it impossible to provide for the necessities of even the small population of London alone. The enormous number of applications for assistance he daily receives, chiefly from total strangers, makes it necessary for him to apologize for not entirely supporting the applicants and their families; and it is with shame he is obliged to confess himself unable to accomplish so desirable an object. He has had quite enough to do to fight through his own difficulties, and has been and is still laboring at a time of life when many men would be glad to be sitting quietly by their firesides, in the hope of acquiring a small independence for his old age, which endeavor would be completely frustrated were he to devote all his hard earned savings to the necessities of others. He hereby declares, upon his oath, that though he has lately travelled thousands of miles, and met with all the success he could wish, and is at the present moment basking in the sunshine of public favor, he is not a millionaire; and though warmly attached to his species in the plural, he has at last learnt to value it in the singular—his species having become equally dear to him. It is not that he 'loves Caesar less but that he loves Rome more.' He admits the force of the old quotation: 'Eand ignara mali miseris succurrere disco,' but he offers this new translation: 'Having so long suffered distress of his own, he has learnt—though rather late—to feel for the necessities of the one who is most in want of assistance—namely, himself!'"

Prince Juri (George) Galizyn.*

VITAM IMPENDERE VERO.

Prince Juri Nikolejewitsch Galizyn, who died, last September, in St. Petersburg, and was known by the concerts he gave, with a company of Russian singers, in Germany, England, and America, was descended from an old Boyard family, which spreads over all Russia, and to which belonged Prince Wasili Galizyn, minister of the Zaréwna Sophia; Prince Boris Galizyn, tutor of Peter I., the first Russian Senators, members of Peter I.'s Superior Privy Council, General-Admirals, and Ambassadors. In the time of Lipinski and Boehm, his father, Prince

* From the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

Nikolai Borisowitsch, was (up to the age of thirty) a zealous and skilful member of the Quartet Society in St. Petersburg. It was in his house that Lipinski tried the E flat major Quartet which Beethoven dedicated to the Prince, after Franz Boehm had given it up as something impossible to play; Lipinski, on the other hand, was ravished, and entranced with it. The Prince gave more than four hundred concerts. He was a fanatico per la musica. His comprehension of Beethoven was not profound; the great thing for him was taking a part in the performance; playing; playing a great deal; consequently he performed at very many concerts, all over Russia, especially in Charkow and Tambow, though he was not such a master on his instrument as Count Wielhorski. This Prince died some years ago. He perceived very soon a decided taste for music in his son. That son, Prince Juri, who had as much embonpoint as Lablache, merely pursued music as a dilettante, and till the latter years of his life, if, indeed, at all, did not study it theoretically. He was never master of a large fortune, because his father, in his character of a Mecenas, had greatly diminished the hereditary property, or, probably, spent it entirely. It may be mentioned that his father paid the price fixed by Beethoven for the three Quartets (in B flat, in A, and in E flat, Op. 130, Op. 132, and Op. 127), which he commissioned Beethoven to write ("which he had ordered" is a detestable expression) and dedicate to him; but he paid only a part to Beethoven himself, and the remainder to his heirs.

Prince Juri lived, as was the custom of those of his own rank and age, carelessly from day to day, and it was not till his fortune was completely dissipated that he came before the public as a conductor, at the head of a number of Russian singers whom he had collected and trained. For spreading Russian compositions far and wide abroad, he is undoubtedly entitled to high credit. In the important musical library inherited from his father are Beethoven's three Quartets in manuscript (small quarto, in parts, not in score), with corrections in the composer's hand. The latter have been transferred to the plates. The overture for the Weihnachtsfeier, Op. 124, was also dedicated to the father. It is in no way true that Prince Juri was deserted by his nearest relatives as our Press asserted; it is by no means true that he sacrificed his property for others; he simply expended too much of it in keeping up great show and magnificence as Marshal of the Nobility at Tambow. I knew both the father and the son for thirty years, and cultivated music a great deal with the former; I am, therefore, in a position to affirm that neither understood much of Beethoven. Beethoven's Violoncello Sonatas, Op. 102, especially, were beyond the father's comprehension. Prince Boris played in very poor style, and for reasons easily imagined, unwillingly, the Quartets dedicated to him by Beethoven. They were too difficult for him: "C'est mal doigte," he would frequently say; "C'est tres-incommode," he always said. Never at any period did Prince Boris, or his son, an amiable and affable man, exert any influence upon musical matters. They were contented with the character of Mecenas at home, and figuring everlastingly as executants.

The Voice (Golos), the paper enjoying the largest circulation in St. Petersburg, publishes the following not uninteresting particulars concerning Prince Juri:—"It was abroad that the Prince entered upon an artistic career. A report circulated among us here that a Russian Prince, whose name was not mentioned, had, horribile dictu! appeared in public, conducting-stick in hand. People attached but small credence to the report. The more astounded were they, therefore, when, one day, monster posters announced, very seriously, a concert to be given by the Prince in Pawlowsk (the Kroll's of St. Petersburg). The public, besieged the railway station; train after train was despatched to Pawlowsk, where all the 'high life' of St. Petersburg had assembled. The best places at Vauxhall were filled by ladies belonging to the first society, and by old gentlemen, from whose foreheads the clouds of state cares had only just disappeared; the sides of the hall contained the flower of the infantry, and cavalry officers of the Guard leaning upon their swords. English and French phrases jostled and commingled with each other: 'Mais, comment? He, the member of an ancient princely family! Voilà ou nous en sommes, mesdames! Shocking! Very shocking, sir!—Grev-haired old ladies shook their heads, and grey-haired old gentlemen laughed derisively; the young ladies seemed astonished; the young officers tried to twirl their moustachios in embryo. There appeared upon the stage a portly, corpulent man, with the 'head of an Assyrian king,' as Herz so admirably expressed it. He made a slight obeisance to the public. The applause was rather shy. The chorus burst forth, under the Prince's conducting-stick, wielded impetuously by the Prince. The debut did not produce a furor; the audience had not assembled in such numbers to hear the 'chansons russes,' but to see a chorus conducted by a genuine Russian Prince! a Prince whose genealogical tree formed a part of Russian history from the earliest times. What puzzled them most was the category under which the occurrence was to be ranged. They thought of nihilism, a disease then prevalent everywhere, and now simply ridiculous; but the conductor's high and aristocratic bearing, which clung to him all through his life, did not agree with this theory. They thought of want of money, but it could not well be that; with the Prince's family connections, he might, supposing him incapable of really doing anything, which was not the case, have obtained some appointment with nothing at all to do, which would have raised him above want. The audience decided in favor of the Prince's passionate fondness for music; but there was nothing so very reprehensible about this, and they wanted to lay some kind of transgression to the charge of one who had thus wounded aristocratic pride. 'High life' was most dissatisfied at the sympathy which the event found among the general public. After much debating, it was decided that the Prince's eccentricity, and his yearning for popularity, had induced him to take such a step. There was some truth in this. Amidst the colorless society to which he belonged, he was distinguished all his life for decided originality and energy, which latter, unfortunately, was not invariably devoted to a proper object; for a tendency towards the grandiose in outward things, while the other members of his own class were contented with empty splendor and the strict practice of traditional customs. It is certain that the Prince was no ordinary man. The light-heartedness with which he went through some most difficult moments of his eventful life really borders upon geniality. More than once did Fortune raise him above his difficulties, and more than once did he stand upon the brink of ruin. Out of a luxurious carriage with powdered lackeys did the Prince step into the prison for debt in London. One day he would give a dinner fit for Sardanapalus, and the next, he would have nothing to eat. He mixed in every rank of social life, and was acquainted with every kind of privation, to which he was continually being reduced by his carelessness for the morrow. His entire existence was one series of obstacles over which he triumphed, simply to become again involved. He was made up of contradictions. His efforts to gain money equalled his extravagance. Kind by nature, he often did wrong, and then repented and confessed his fault. Brought up among those who possess no notion of genuine nationality (?), the Prince was, to the last, a man of the people (?), a true Russian, with all the good and all the bad qualities of such an individual. He knew very well that he possessed more enemies than friends, and blamed no one for this but himself. He never concealed his faults, and listened quietly to reproaches, in which neither friend nor foe were ever deficient. One thing, however, is incomprehensible, and that is how it was that, with the energy of which he gave such frequent proofs, he never would combat against himself. 'I have no worse enemy than myself,' he used to say. We cannot attribute everything to the circumstances in which he was placed; but, under different circumstances, he would have been a different man. Nature had not behaved like a stepmother in her gifts to him; led astray, when young, he could not succeed for a long time in finding the right path, on which he did not enter until nearly the close of his life. The lost time, however, was not to be recovered, and for that reason it is not likely that the Prince will ever hold a place of honor in the history of the development of Russian art."

Other organs of the Russian press, which derive their information from the Memoirs he has left, tell us that the Prince was brought up in the corps of Imperial Pages, and for mere amusement taught his comrades choral singing, as he afterwards taught others as a serious means of subsistence. In London it was from the prison for debt that he went to conduct his concerts, returning to prison after he had finished conducting, and being accompanied both to and from by a policeman (?). In America he did not make money; the principal sphere of his efforts in Russia was at the concerts of the Zoological Gardens, Moscow, where he was popular, which was not the case in St. Petersburg. are told in his Memoirs, did he burst into tears over his misfortunes. In London he set his colleagues against him by his aristocratic bearing. At one concert he gave the signal for beginning the overture to Zampa, and the orchestra obeyed by bursting out into a horrible medley: they were playing from the parts of a number of different operas, which had been substituted for the proper ones. The public hooted and jeered, the speculator cried off his bargain, and the Prince stood alone in the great foreign capital, not even able to speak with fluency the language of the country.—In our opinion it was simply the wish to show himself and be talked about which brought the Prince before the public; he deserved a better fate, and was not without natural gifts.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, NOV. 21.—As I have already taken a large allowance of your space, I will restrict myself to a brief record of the concerts which have been given since the date of my last letter. Last week Mr. Grau gave us three soirees of chamber music and one matinee. Messrs. Rubinstein and Wieniawski were assisted in these concerts by Mr. F. Bergner, Mr. Matzka, Mr. Goffrie and others. Mlle. Liebhart was the vocalist. The concerts were given at Steinway Hall, and, although the auditorium was too large for chamber music, a small room would not have contained the audience, which was uniformly good both in number and kind. The first soiree (Nov. 12th), opened with Mendelssohn's trio in C minor, played by Rubinstein, Wieniawski and Bergner. Then Mlle. Liebhart sang one of Mendelssohn's songs, which was followed by a Beethoven Quartet for two violins, viola and cello, played by Messrs. Wieniawski, Matzka, Goffrie and Bergner. Mlle. Liebhart then gave us a Cradle Song by Taubert, and a bright little melody by Schubert. Hummel's celebrated Septet in D minor ended the programme. It was played by Messrs. Rubinstein, Rietzel, Ohlemann, Lotze, Goffrie, Bergner and Raeder.

I give, below, the instrumental pieces played at the succeeding concerts in the order in which they came.

Nov. 13. Quintet, E flat, Schumann; Rubinstein, Wieniawski, Loewenberg, Goffrie, Bergner. Quintet, B flat, Mendelssohn; Messrs. Wieniawski, Loewenberg, Goffrie, Matzka, Bergner. Trio, B flat, Beethoven; Messrs. Rubinstein, Wieniawski and Bergner.

Nov. 15. Trio, B flat, Schubert. Anton Rubinstein, Wieniawski, F. Bergner. Quartet, Haydn, Messrs. Wieniawski, Matzka, Goffrie, Bergner. Trio, G minor, Rubinstein; Anton Rubinstein, Henri Wieniawski, F. Bergner.

Nov. 16. Quartet, E flat, Schumann; Rubinstein, Wieniawski, Goffrie, Bergner. Quintet, G minor, Mozart; Messrs. Wieniawski, Loewenberg, Goffrie, Matzka, Bergner. Trio, B flat, Rubinstein; Anton Rubinstein, Henry Wieniawski, F. Bergner.

There is nothing in our concert record to equal these soirees in the classical character of their programmes and the talent of the performers.

One addition has been made to the repertoire at the Opera; namely: Les Huguenots, which was performed last night for the first time this season, with Mme. Pauline Lucca as Valentine. The morning papers speak highly of her singing, although they give but faint praise to the other performers. In fact the Italian Opera is generally acknowledged to be a dismal failure, and there are predictions that the management will have to retire ingloriously from the field at the close of the present season.

At the first Philharmonic Concert, which took place on Saturday evening, Nov. 16th, the following orchestral pieces were performed; Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner; Overture, Prinzessin "Isle," Erdmannsdorfer; Symphony, No. 7, Beethoven.

Anton Rubinstein was the soloist and played, first, his favorite Concerto in D minor; his other selection being Chopin's "Preludes" Liszt's "Erl King," and, for encore, the march from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens."

Dec. 7.—Mr. S. B. MILLS and Dr. LEOPOLD DAMROSCH have given two very agreeable chamber concerts at Steinway's smaller hall; and it must have been gratifying for the artists to see the room so well filled with people whose musical culture was evinced by the manner in which every nice point or fine turn of expression made by the performer was appreciated and applauded. At the first concert, Nov. 21, they were assisted by Mlle. Anna Drasdil, contralto (from London), and by Mr. F. Bergner, whose presence is almost a necessary thing when chamber-music is to be played here. Beethoven's Sonata in G, op. 96, for piano and violin, opened the programme, and received a masterly interpretation at the hands of Mr. Mills and Dr. Damrosch. The former displayed to perfection the beautiful legato style which Beethoven's music requires, and though his playing was at times a little cold, no other fault could be found by the most critical. Dr. Damrosch is an admirable violinist, severely classical in style as well as graceful and poetic. He makes no claim to virtuosity, but his facility of execution, particularly in polyphonic passages, is remarkable. His soli were a Prelude (in E) by J. S. Bach, and an Adagio by Spohr, which brought an encore. Mr. Mills played Chopin's Scherzo, op. 20, which was also encored.

Miss ANNA DRASDIL made decidedly a favorable impression. Her voice is a deep, clear contralto of great power, and somewhat metallic in timbre. Her phrasing is very fine, and she has evidently studied to great advantage. Her selections were F. Hiller's beautiful "Prayer" and Mendelssohn's "Herbstlied". The first piece was so well sung that it had to be repeated, and, being recalled after the "Herbstlied," she sang another German Lied.

The concert ended with a very noisy and uninteresting trio, by C. Frank, (F-sharp minor), which did something to obliterate the pleasant impression made by the other selections.

The second soiree came on Thursday evening, Dec. 5, the instrumental artists being the same as before, while the place of the vocalist was taken by Mr. Geo. A. Dennison. Joachim Raff's Sonata in G minor, op. 129, for piano and violin, was first on the programme. Then Mr. Dennison sang Schubert's "Wanderer." His voice is a very fair baritone, but lacks cultivation, and his singing was somewhat labored.

Mr. Mills followed with a splendid interpretation of Schumann's Intermezzo, op. 4, 2nd book, revealing clearly the strange beauty of this weird and wonderful tone-poem. On being encored he gave one of Chopin's Nocturnes. The next piece was an Adagio for Violin by Mozart, played by Dr. Damrosch. This brought an encore, to which Dr. Damrosch responded with a transcription for the violin, (his own I believe) of Chopin's waltz in D flat. This was indeed gratifying, inasmuch as Chopin carefully avoided writing for any thing but the piano, and many of his pieces sound infinitely better on some other instrument. I have already heard one of his funeral marches "played on to a flute" (!), and have no doubt that some enterprising musician will give us the Adagio of the second Concerto on the cornet a piston.

Mr. Dennison sang Beethoven's "Adelaide," and the concert ended with the quaint and beautiful Trio, in E flat, op. 70, by the same composer, played by Mr. Mills, Dr. Damrosch and Mr. F. Bergner.

All three of the instruments were nicely handled and the performance was as good as could be desired. These soirees have already taken very high rank, to which they are entitled by the excellence of the programmes as well as by the distinction of the artists.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society gave their first concert for the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, on Saturday evening, Nov. 30, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was performed by an excellent orchestra under Carl Bergmann. The other orchestral selections were Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" Overture, and Liszt's "Mazeppa." Miss Kellogg was the vocalist and sang the "Letter Aria" from Don Giovanni remarkably well. Also a scena from Lucia di Lammermoor. Miss Mehlig, at the piano, played Schumann's great Concerto, and a Rhapsodie, by Liszt. Her performance was very effective. The audience was a large and brilliant one and the prospects are good for a successful season.

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 22.—We have had an unbroken chain of highly enjoyable musical entertainments. Mr. Wolfsohn's second orchestral matinee, which took place at Horticultural Hall last Saturday afternoon, being the first in order, let me briefly review it.

Haydn's sprightly little "Surprise" Symphony was the main feature, and it was delightfully played. The lights and shades were well marked, and the expression carefully observed. The Andante (in C major) was especially to be admired for the precision and crispness that it so essentially requires. The only other pieces given us of any moment were Nesvabda's clever arrangement of "Lorelei," and a saxophone solo by Mr. Lefebvre. On Tuesday the 19th, Theodore Thomas began a series of six concerts. The Overture to Cherubini's "Water-Carrier" and Weber's "Oberon" Overtures were most faithfully rendered. But the "Brook Scene" in the Pastoral Symphony was the highest exemplification of absolutely perfect orchestral playing I ever heard; the executive powers of every performer seemed for the time being to be completely governed by the will and sentiment of the conductor, and hence the result I described. Mr. Osgood made his first appearance with an aria from "Belmonte und Constanze," and for encore Schubert's "Serenade." In Part II. he sang four songs of Schumann and in "Up from my tears" he displayed most excellent qualities as a singer; but his voice lacks power, and is quite limited in compass. Nevertheless he sings honestly and clearly. Miss Mehlig was warmly welcomed on her appearing; she gave us a Ballade of Chopin's. Mr. Jacobsohn, the new violinist, selected for his debut here the Andante and Finale of Mendelssohn's Concerto, op. 64; but he did not give the opening with enough certainty and vigor; yet in the closing movement he exhibited considerable sentiment and refinement.

The majestic Seventh Symphony of Beethoven was the attraction at Wednesday's concert. The whole work was given to us without a flaw in the spirit or act of presentation. The "Scherzo" was superb. Mr. Osgood sang "Comfort ye," and "Every valley." I do not think his performance of the air was entirely happy; his main difficulty appears to be that he can not hold his breath for any time, and this marred his performance. Franz's "Slumber Song" he gave with a tenderness and delicacy that was truly delightful. Miss Mehlig won for herself an encore by her exquisite playing of Liszt's "Weber's Polonaise."

On Thursday evening "Elijah" was given by the Handel and Haydn Society. The soloists were Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Fairman, Messrs. Simpson and Whitney. Mme. Rudersdorff sang her recita-tives with true dramatic intensity. And to the airs also she gave an honest construction: for example, the widow's despairing cry for aid in "Help me, man of God," the credulous "Wilt thou show wonders to the dead," and the Angel's exhortation: "Hear ye Israel" could not have received a more dramatic portrayal from a Ristori. But her manner on the stage is not what we are accustomed to. Whitney was very great in his airs, but his recitatives were not given as Dr. Guilmette used to speak them. "It is enough" he sang exquisitely. Mr. Simpson sang as usual. "If with all your hearts" suits his style, and hence shows him in his best colors. But "Then shall the righteous" requires the vigor of a Sims Reeves to give it effect. Miss Fairman won for herself the only solo encore of the evening for her pleasing performance of "Rest in the Lord." Her voice is a rich and smooth Contralto. The tempo at which she took this solo was a great improvement on what is generally heard. It is marked "Andantino" and is sung "Largo." The choruses were generally good, but the orchestra quite bad.

To night Thomas's Orchestra gave their third concert. Berlioz's "King Lear" Overture and Liszt's "Symphonic Poem" [which one?] together with the "Tannhaeuser" Overture were the principal Orchestral pieces. Miss Mehlig played the first movement of the G-major Beethoven Concerto. Mr. Osgood sang Schubert's "Erl King" exceedingly well; and in Part II. he sang a song of his own, "John Anderson's gone." It is a pleasing little morceau in the Scotch style. Mr. Listemann gave us Paganini's "Witch Dance." The matinee to-morrow and the concert in the evening will close the season.

Nov. 30.—Theodore Thomas closed his series of concerts last Saturday with a matinee and an evening performance. At the former, Rubinstein's "Dimitri Donskoi" overture, Raff's "Dame Kobolt," Beethoven's 2nd Symphony, (Larghetto), and the third act of Lohengrin, were the orchestral part of the programme. Mr. Osgood sang three songs of Franz with great and tasteful expression, and Mr. Jacobsohn gave us a Notturmo of Ernst's and a piece by Hauser. Miss Mehlig was rapturously applauded for her forcible rendering of Liszt's "Rhapsodie Hongroise." At the evening concert, (the last of the season), Mozart's G-minor symphony headed the remarkably rich programme. The "Andante" was perfectly interpreted and indeed so was the whole work. In Chopin's Concerto, op. 11, Mehlig shone forth, particularly brightly in the "Rondo." The "Andante Cantabile" of Beethoven's Trio, op. 97, adapted for the Orchestra as the Introduction to Liszt's "Beethoven Cantata" was new to me; but the orchestration is so skilful, and the execution was so good that it was a great treat. Berlioz's orchestral arrangement of Invitation a la Danse, Liszt's Huldigungs Marsch, and selections from Wagner's "Ring of the Niebelungen," together with Mr. Osgood's most acceptable singing of Schubert's Serenade, completed the programme.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 14, 1872.

Theodore Thomas's Concerts.

Boston is glad when her turn comes to be revisited by this distinguished leader and his admirable orchestra. That it is the most perfect orchestra on this side of the Atlantic, in all respects except in numbers, is clear enough, and has been clear for several years,—indeed from the time that it began its annual circuits through the music-loving towns and cities East and West. We have always welcomed these men, both for the stimulating example they have brought us of what may fairly be called model orchestral performances, and in no small degree also for gratifying our curiosity about the new composers whose names are prominent before the world, although confessing to less sympathy with most of these than we had hoped to have. But though we cannot share with Mr. Thomas in his admiration of the works of Liszt and Berlioz and Wagner, which he so heroically persists in bringing forward season after season,—in spite of rather cold reception from the general audience, and very cold from those who are most musical, with few exceptions,—yet none the less we thank him for trying for us these experiments which we, without his orchestra and his peculiar advantages, should find it poor economy, indeed a waste of better opportunities, to try ourselves.

The problem so conspicuously solved by Mr. Thomas is naturally a somewhat different one from that presented to a local organization,—say our own Symphony Concerts. With him it is to keep complete, and in prime working order at all times, a thoroughly assimilated, perfect band, equipped and ready for all instrumental tasks, omnipresent like a battery of flying artillery, and nowhere suffering the novelty to wear off; in a word to have always in training, and to carry everywhere a shining specimen of what we may call orchestral virtuosity. For any local organization (i.e. in this country) this, even if it were possible, as it is by no means, is not the problem, not the chief end sought. Here the point is to build up something permanent, out of our own resources, which shall be as independent as possible of outward influences, competitions, fashions, just to make sure of hearing every season, at fair intervals, some programmes of the best standard instrumental music; so that Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, &c., may never go too long without a hearing; to have them presented in fit combinations and in a true artistic spirit, and as to execution, why as near to the ideal as local circumstances will permit; but these can never be entirely favorable, because an orchestra made up for ten or a dozen concerts in a winter can never hope to rival an orchestra which is always an orchestra, whose members live by that and nothing else. Both problems are legitimate; society would be the loser if either were neglected. We need the permanent supplies at home, unfailling fountains springing in our midst; we need also the fresh surprise and stimulus of brilliant visitations from without. But the first need is vital, indispensable; as much more important than the other as is the home life more important than the fickle, changeable outside society. It is suicidal for a musical community to cease to cherish, with something like religious zeal and constancy, its own musical institutions, in which its own best artistic aspirations are embodied, even for all the brilliant novelties which all the travelling artists in the world can bring one after another, in a perpetual round of brief distracting "seasons." But so long as we keep on building for ourselves,—loyal to the true ideal of our own Orchestra, our own Oratorio Society, (would we might say, too, our own Opera!), in spite of all the drawbacks and short-comings of each given moment, so long are we in a condition rightly to profit by the bright examples and the extra holidays which men like Thomas bring to us. We think that his performances have had a quickening influence on our own Orchestra from year to year; and we shall think his mission wasted on us, if it do not help us in the long run to establish ourselves musically upon our own foundation, which shall be self-centred and enduring; so established, we can afford better to be hospitable.

Moreover they have earned our special gratitude just now, by coming to us in this gloomy season after Boston's great calamity, and filling a whole week with harmony and sunshine (in strong relief against black thunder-clouds of Liszt and Wagner!). Without these splendid concerts,—six of them (seven, counting the one given in the Bay State Lecture course),—more than a week would have gone uncheered by music. They came with full ranks, armor furnished bright, in perfect training, fresh and full of ardor. That is to say, the orchestra was better than ever,—if that were possible,—which we are inclined to doubt, even in spite of our own last impression. Most of the excellent members of past years were gladly recognized again, with several new and valuable accessions to their ranks. The number, of violins at least, was somewhat increased,—to 10 first violins, as in the Harvard,—the cellos and basses being fewer;—but the extra instruments (harp, piccolo, bass tuba, triangle, &c.) required by the new music, swelling the muster roll considerably. The very first sound was electrifying; such pure and brilliant intonation, such perfect ensemble of tone color; such sure attack and vital unity in the violins, all bowed alike. And then as the work progressed one felt the charm and individuality of each several instrument, and admired the habit or the instinct that they had of keeping themselves subordinate to the general harmonious effect. Such a crystal clear, true ring to all the brass, too! Such precision, faultless phrasing, light and shade,—in short all that pertains to perfect execution:—why need we name these qualities again, all of which have always been accredited to the Thomas orchestra, and which may now again be predicated generally of the whole week's performances, without specifying in detail how well this or that particular piece was rendered.

And ought it not to be a model orchestra? It is the only orchestra in this country that can be said to have a chance. For in the first place Mr. Thomas has his pick of artists; he can offer them year-round engagements, with good, sure salaries, so that they can make this their sole and constant occupation, playing always in one orchestra, under the same superior Conductor, always "up" in all the music old and new of any high pretensions, and kept aloof from damaging association with tasks less artistic. With that power, what can not a man do, if he have it in him? Whereas, in any given city, so small as ours for instance, a musician plays once a fortnight in a Symphony concert (for a few months only), and all the rest of the time perhaps must earn his bread and butter in a street band, or a theatre, or by playing all night for balls and parties, to come back jaded and sleepless to the next rehearsal of a Symphony. For local Symphony and Philharmonic orchestras there can be no sure hold upon the best musicians, because these offer them no constant and supporting occupation, but only seek their services for six or ten concerts in a winter. Thus the travelling orchestra can not only be made up of first-class material, but in the nature of the case it keeps itself in perpetual rehearsal and in practice before critical publics every day almost in the whole year,—in the hot months giving delicious garden concerts at the Central Park,—a thing which we trust our "Puritanism" will feel the need of before many summers.—Besides, preparing for this endless round of concerts, they can afford to spend time and breath upon the trial of new works, can venture into the "Zukunft" as far as they like; and here again they gain a knowledge of the new effects of instrumentation, often brilliant or otherwise interesting, and in which Liszt and Berlioz and Wagner are masters, if in nothing else; all this keeps up their virtuosity, as difficult études do with the pianist, and makes all their tasks more sure and easy.—Now we do not say that, given these advantages, it does not need a man of mark to use them. Not every one, nor one in a thousand, probably, could wield them with the power and the intelligence and subtle faculty of Mr. Thomas. He is rarely gifted for the master spirit of an orchestra; in a singularly cool and quiet way he has his forces perfectly in hand. We only marvel sometimes at his taste. And this brings us to his programmes, of which we may now speak dis-embarrassed from all necessity of further allusion to their admirable execution, except now and then a question of interpretation.

The programmes were made up of essentially the same elements, in about the same proportions, with most of the Thomas concerts heretofore: namely, about one-third classical (a good overture or two, now and then a symphony, or part of one, a short entr'acte, or an arranged movement, and sometimes a Concerto); one-third, sometimes a full half, of the Liszt-Wagner-Berlioz kind; and one-third of Strauss Waltzes, solos, lighter overtures and variations. This time the new element of solo-singing, by Mr. GEORGE L. OSGOOD, tenor, (whose speciality is the German Lied, of the higher kind, by Schubert, Schumann, Franz, &c.), was introduced, with dubious response at first, but to the growing satisfaction of appreciative listeners. Then there was the ever welcome piano playing of Miss MEHLIG.

Under the first head the principal features have been: first, a wonderfully vivid, clear, precise, exhilarating performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. As a piece of orchestral virtuosity we have heard nothing like the way that the Finale was played with lightning rapidity, and yet all clear. Whether Beethoven so meant it, is, to say the least, a fair question. We feel very certain that the first Allegro also was too fast. Indeed these tempi appeared dictated by a common theory about this Symphony: that it means joy, festivity and nothing else; whereas that first Allegro (and not the second movement only) contains thoughts of weight and dignity as well as joy, which, to maintain their character, should move with some degree of moderation. To the Allegretto and the Scherzo we take no exception; their rendering was altogether admirable; only in that sublime episode, the Trio, where the heavens seem to open, and the A is sounded all through, it seemed that some of the grandeur was lost by not holding back the time a little more. Then the G-minor Symphony of Mozart (with clarinets not found in Mozart's score), which was of course well played, but without any particular unction or fervor, seeming to show some want of interest in the old masterwork. We mean that this exquisite Symphony seemed to go by rote, mechanically well, but uninspired; and the bold, strong Minuet was hurried through. The "Scene by the Brookside" from the Pastoral Symphony, in the first concert, was indeed most beautifully rendered. But would not the exquisite tone picture have been still more enjoyed and felt if it had been preceded by the first movement, in which after all the real inspiration of that Symphony resides, its theme giving the key to the whole work, instead of being isolated like a picture hung amid unrelated although very worthy neighbors?—Of classical Overtures the list was rich and choice, and all were admirably effective in the rendering. It included Cherubini's "Water-Carrier," "Weber's "Oberon," Mendelssohn's "Melusina," Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis, Weber's Frey-schuetz, Rossini's Tell, and Beethoven's Egmont. In Gluck's noble Overture Mr. Thomas followed the suggestions of Richard Wagner, who not only put to it a conclusion, which it lacks originally, running directly into the opening scene of the opera, and who did it well and wisely, simply bringing back the solemn, plaintive Introduction, which also forms the introduction to the scene; but who also, after consulting the old French edition of the score, and finding "Andante" at the beginning of the Overture with no other mark occurring afterwards, made up his mind that the whole piece should be played through at that very moderate tempo; whereas it is usual to double the speed to an Allegro when the more exciting theme sets in. In spite of the old printed score, we cannot (as yet) feel that it is in the nature of the piece to walk along at such a slow and stately pace. But we should like to hear both renderings before deciding.—The favorite "Prometheus" selection (Beethoven) was played, a new 'cello (Mr. HEMMANN), with a beautiful tone and style, taking the obligato melody. Liszt's arrangement for orchestra of the Andante Cantabile of the great B-flat Trio of Beethoven (forming the introduction to his "Beethoven Cantata") made a deep impression, both by the rich, full, broad effect of all the strings in the cantabile itself, and by the skilful way in which the melodic phrases in one or two of the variations were distributed amongst the reeds, flutes, &c. The Berlioz transcription of Weber's "Invitation," was as delicious as ever. Selections of this kind were fewer than usual this time; there were none of those admirably effective movements from classical quartets, the Beethoven Septet, &c., by all the strings, which formed so fine a feature of the last year's concerts (with the single exception of the D-minor Schubert Variations in the "Lecture" concert); while the "everlasting" Träumerei and Haydn "Serenade" seem to have got their quietus altogether; (high time, we should think, if it be true that fifty thousand dollars worth of piano copies of the former have been sold in this country through the magic of the Thomas pianissimo.)

Under the second head we were treated in the first concert to very wild, tumultuous selections from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," including Senta's spinning song; to a Menuet des Follets and Ballet des Sylphes, from Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust," containing some very pretty and ingenious playing with musical sounds, but little of intrinsic music, the marvellously fine execution being two-thirds of what charm there was in it; and the Rakoczy March by Liszt. The next day's matinee brought Liszt's "Tasso," for the fourth or fifth time here, which does not grow less wearisome and dismal to us, or a whit more original after the "Preludes" by repetition; and a not very edifying "Huldigungs," or Homage, March by Wagner. On the third day we had selections from the first act of Lohengrin,—by no means so effective as those which Thomas used to give from the third act,—at least when cut out from the drama on the stage: and for a night-cap, Liszt's "Mephisto Waltz," the coarse scene in the village inn, from Lenau's Faust, which we had once last year, and which, if it be music, seems to us such music as is "not fit for ears polite." The "King Lear" Overture by Berlioz, the next night, and the new specimen of Liszt's "Symphonic Poems": "Die Hunnen-Nacht (Battle of the Huns), illustrating Kaulbach's famous fresco, and bringing in the Organ (Mr. J. K. PAINÉ), it was our misfortune (perhaps) not to hear. The Tannhaeuser Overture wound up that concert. The only striking novelty remaining of this class was (preceded by the Lohengrin Vorspiel, which we have always found interesting): Der Ritt der Walkuren, the Ride of Odin's Maidens, messengers of death in battle,—a strange, wild, rushing, headlong movement, multitudinous and wierd, which might be "awful and beautiful beings" with streaming hair on ghastly steeds, or witches riding upon broom-sticks, or a herd of buffaloes, or the swine going out from those possessed by evil spirits, or a fierce mob of sans-culottes, for aught that the sounds suggested to the imagination of the hearer. The oddity of the movement, almost laughable, made it not easy to regard it seriously as music. The picture had not the imaginative quality, the remoteness, the aerial perspective, so to speak, of something mythical, poetic, but rather seemed conceived and drawn in the spirit of a most materialistic realism. So at least it seemed to us; perhaps we might receive a different impression were we to hear it in the opera brought out under all the Wagnerian conditions.

—We must pass by an agreeable variety of lighter orchestral pieces, &c., for the present, to save room for brief mention of the two principal solo artists. Miss MEHLIG's selections were old favorites and of the best: the Larghetto and Finale from Chopin's F-minor Concerto; first movement of the Beethoven Concerto in G, with von Bülow's cadenza; the Weber Polonaise, arranged by Liszt; and the Romance and Rondo of the E-minor Concerto of Chopin, were her pieces with orchestra. And for piano alone: the Chopin Ballade in A flat, Schumann's "Des Abends," the "Soirees de Vienna" (Schubert-Liszt) "Gnomon-Reigen" by Seelig, &c. All of which were rendered in that admirable manner which is sure to charm her audiences.

Singing is a new feature in the Thomas concerts. Mr. OSGOOD's sweet and sympathetic tenor voice, though not of power enough to sing with perfect ease in the great Music Hall, yet made itself clearly heard in all parts; and more and more, as one became accustomed to it, and to his whole individuality, as well as to the peculiar class of songs to which he most devotes himself, was its charm felt. His lower tones are not very pure nor is his compass great; the effort, too, to overcome the disproportion of the place to so delicate an organ caused some tremolo. But the fervor, the expression, the refinement of a genuine, an intelligent and conscientiously cultivated singer won their way, if slowly, surely. His larger efforts were: "Comfort ye," from the Messiah; the lover's aria in Mozart's Figaro; Schubert's Serenade and Erl-King. The Serenade was given with orchestra,—rather too formidable a substitute for the light guitar-like accompaniment in the original. But the singing of all these pieces was artistic, and full of fervor, although the singer does not seem to lose himself so fully in his song as doubtless he would do in a smaller and more sympathetic audience. The smaller songs (Lieder) were: Schubert's "Frühlingstraube," which seemed particularly suited for him; "Good morning, maiden" and "Die böse Farbe," from the Schoens Mullerin, and "Dream of Spring." Of Schumann: four of the little breaths of song, melodic moods, from the Dichterliebe of Heine; five little poems by Lenau, charmingly contrasted, one of them ("Meine Rose") most exquisite, and rendered to a charm. Of Franz: "Abendlied," "Tis the dark green leaves," and "In the Woods;" "The Rose complained," and "Slumber, thou art mine." Of Mendelssohn an old German Minnetied, and Mozart's charming "Violet" [from Goethe]. Some of these he sang in English, with remarkably distinct enunciation, and some in German. Many will not be reconciled to such songs, so declamatory, and short and fragmentary in respect to melody, except in a parlor. For the concert they desire the flowing cantilena; whereas these little songs are composed upon another principle: that of simply giving musical expression to the words: liberating, as it were, the latent soul, the inmost essential music of the little poems. Mr. Osgood, and Mr. Thomas, nevertheless are to be thanked for giving the public a chance for some acquaintance with gems so instinct with poetry and genius, so fresh and full of individuality.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT. The audience was the largest and the best yet seen in the Music Hall this season. Gade is a composer whose Symphonies, now eight in number, fall off in strength and inspiration as he goes on. The second, in E, which was substituted for the fifth, after its trial in rehearsal, is the next best to the No. 1, in C minor. It had been heard here only once before, four years ago, when it was not appreciated at its full worth. It has all the Gade individuality, the romantic Northern sea-shore character; bold, old bardic, Volkslied themes, with a strong nationality and a heroic ring to them, contrasted with charming fairy measures. The instrumentation is very rich and graphic. The Andante is very grand, containing material for a superb national hymn; and so is much of the Finale. It was played with spirit, if with some roughness, and was greatly enjoyed by many, if not by all. The opening Overture, Mozart's to "Titus," has only one fault, that of being too short; both that and the concluding one by Mendelssohn, to "Ruy Blas," was finely played.

Miss ALICE FAIRMAN, by her large and smooth contralto, and her good honest cantabile style of singing, made a good impression in the Cradle Song of Bach, which, with the orchestral accompaniments as completed in Bach's very spirit by Robert Franz, formed a most lovely whole. In the Aria: "Cangio d'aspetto," from Handel's Admeto with piano accompaniment, she had more room for effect, and won a very hearty encore.—Miss MEHLIG played Liszt's half-romantic, half-uncouth Concerto in E flat wonderfully well; if anything could reconcile us to the work it would be her performance. The Chopin Nocturne seemed to us a little over-sentimentalized; but the great Bach Organ Prelude and Fugue in A minor, transcribed by Liszt were played with masterly distinctness, vitality and power, and riveted attention, giving great delight.

Next Concert, three weeks from the last, Dec. 26.

The musical prospect brightens! but we have no room to name the things promised us.

Foreign Correspondence.

BERLIN, Oct. 26.—This week has been quite an eventful one. It began on Monday with the funeral of Prince Albrecht, the youngest brother of the Emperor, a very imposing spectacle, of which I had an excellent view from a wagon which was drawn up to overlook the procession. There was a roadway of wood carpeted with black, built from the royal castle to the Dom, over which the funeral array was to pass. We waited about an hour before it came along, but we were pretty well amused by the gorgeous equipages and liveries of the different diplomatic corps which went flashing past. We were on the opposite side of the canal, and so were separated from the square in front of the Dom, which is flanked by the castle on the right, and the Museum on the left hand. All this square was surrounded by troops; for as Prince Albrecht was a field-marshal, the funeral had a military character. They were beautifully arranged, the cavalry on one side and the infantry on the other, and the different uniforms were contrasted with each other so as to make the best effects in color. Both horses and men stood as if they were carved out of marble, with the greatest precision of position.

A little before eleven the royal carriages rolled by from the palace to the castle with their occupants. Presently the bells began to toll, and exactly at eleven the procession started. The Garde du Corps, which is the crown prince's regiment, preceded the coffin, dressed in white and silver uniforms, with glittering brass helmets surmounted by silver eagles. The coffin itself was borne on a catafalque, and drawn by eight horses covered with black velvet trappings. It was yellow and was surmounted by a crown of gold. On it was laid the Prince's sword, helmet, etc., and some flowers. I was too far away to distinguish the personages that followed; of course the Emperor was nearest, and all were on foot. The band played a Choral, "Jesus my refuge"—I believe—and the bells kept tolling all the while. Behind the coffin the prince's favorite horse was led, saddled and bridled. All the servants of his household walked together in silver livery, and with large triangular hats with long bands of crape hanging down behind. At the door of the church the procession was received by the officiating clergy. The coffin was so heavy that it was rolled from the wagon down a platform of boards put up for the purpose. Then it was lifted by sixteen bearers, the glittering cortège closed round it, and they all swept in at the open portal. We waited until the end of the service, as it was a short one, in order to hear the eight rounds of firing by the artillery. It was interesting to see how exactly they all fired the instant the signal was given. First the musketry on one side, and then that on the other side in answer to it. The officers galloped and curvetted about on their fiery steeds, and finally the cannon went boom, boom. The sharp crack of the rifles made you start, but the sullen roar of the cannon made you shudder. It gave you some idea of a battle. A friend told me that the scene within the Dom was magnificent, and that the music was perfectly heavenly. I can imagine that the uniforms stood out most beautifully against the black draped church, and the catafalque was surrounded with burning wax candles. The coffin was left in the church until night, when it was carried out to Charlottenburg escorted by the royal family, and buried in the royal vault there.

Tuesday night I went to a concert given by one of the newer stars in the musical world, the young violinist WILHELMJ. He is only twenty-six years old, and is already said to be one of the greatest virtuosos living, perhaps the greatest of the romantic school, for Joachim belongs to the severe classic.

All the artists and critics and many of the aristocracy turned out to hear him. It was his first appearance in Berlin, and as I looked around the audience and picked out one great musician after another, I fairly trembled for him. Joachim and De Ahna were both present, and my adorable Baroness von Schlcinitz swept in late, looking more exquisite than ever in black lace over black silk with jet ornaments, and her lovely hair curled and done high on her aristocratic little head. She was all in mourning for the prince, even to a black lace fan with which she occasionally shaded her eyes, so that her peach-bloomy cheek was just to be discerned through it. When her face is in perfect repose she has the most charming expression, a mixture of piquancy and sentiment, and a sort of celestial look in her deep-set blue eyes. She is what the French call spirituelle, and the Germans geistreich, but we've no word in our language that just describes her. She is the best amateur in the court circle, and the friend of all the great artists, and at concerts I enjoy gazing at her from the distance as on a bright particular star.

Well, as I was saying, my head got quite dizzy with thinking what it was to play before such an audience, but Wilhelmj seemed to differ from me, for he came boldly down the steps, and took his stand with the dignified self-poise of an artist who is master of his instrument, and who knows what he can do. He was extremely handsome, with regular features, massive overhanging forehead, and with an expression of power and self-containment. He looked like a perfect picture as he stood there so quietly and played! He hadn't gone far before he made a masterly cadenza that took down the house, and there was a general burst of applause. His tone, (which is the grand thing in violin playing) was magnificent, and his technique enormous. He did not play with that tenderness of feeling and wonderful variety of expression that Joachim does, but it was as if he did not care to affect people in that way. It made me think of Tausig on the piano. He played with the greatest passion and aplomb, and the strings seemed actually to seethe. People were simply carried by storm.

The second piece was a Concerto by Raff, in three movements. Wilhelmj was in the midst of the Andante, and was sawing our hearts out with every stroke of his bow, when suddenly a string snapped under the strain of his passionate fingers. He instantly ceased playing and retired up the steps to the back of the stage, where he sat down to put on another string. After a pause he came down and began again, but the string was so out of tune that he retired a second time. [He probably didn't excrete a little inwardly just about then—O no!] But he came down the third time with the utmost imperturbability, and got through. He had to omit the last two pieces on his programme though, and instead he played a little Suite by Bach so wonderfully that I was really startled. I never shall forget the nuances he put into his trill; I afterward heard that it was a piece he scarcely knew at all! In short, Miss B. and I went "perfectly distracted" over Wilhelmj. But I was surprised myself to see how he excited me, for I kept dreaming all night that I saw him standing there and playing on his violin, and kept waking up with a start. There must have been a striking individuality about him to make such an impression on an old "Musiker" like myself who am steeped in concerts all the while. He is great, and I hope you will hear him some day in America.

LEIPZIG. Fourth Gewandhaus Concert: Overture to Genoveva, Schumann; Aria, Beethoven, (Mlle. Orgeni); Violoncello Concerto, A minor, Goldtermann (Herr Rendsburg); Songs; Adagio for cello, Bargiel; fifth Symphony, Beethoven.

Fifth Gewandhaus Concert: "Michel Angelo" Overture, Gade; Hymn from Pandora, B. Scholtz (Herr Gura); E-flat Concerto, Beethoven (Herr Urspruch); Duet from Der Fliegende Holländer, Wagner; Symphony, No. 4, G minor, Raff; Organ Toccata, Bach-Tausig (Herr Urspruch); and Songs.

Reminiscences of Mendelssohn.

BY HIS ENGLISH PUPIL.

From this time Mendelssohn became the most intimate friend of my family. He used to come to us at all times when in London, and especially to breakfast, generally accompanied by his friends above named, Rosen and Klingemann. We had a small garden attached to my father's house, and it was Mendelssohn's great delight to spend hours in this, sketching the trees, &c., and talking not only about music, but about his travels in Italy, his intimacy with Goethe and Zelter, and his future plans for his works. During these mornings we frequently heard the first germs of compositions that have now become immortal. The beautiful overtures to "Melusine" and "Isles of Fingal" were played at Kensington some years, I may say, before they were performed, and my sister possesses a copy of the first MS. totally different from those now published. In like manner we heard scraps of "St. Paul," which was not produced till 1836, and many other works which then only existed in the great composer's head; and it was a matter of wonderment how so small a body could contain so many ideas, each belonging to a different composition, and yet all arranged in the most perfect and symmetrical order.

In 1832 the west end of London, especially that part commencing at Tyburn Gate and continuing down the Uxbridge or Oxford Road, wore a very different aspect from the present. From Hyde Park Terrace to the "Swan" down at Bayswater, was a wild waste of scrub and fields, partly occupied by market and nursery gardens, and also by low shanties similar to those yet to be found in the neighborhood of the Central Park in New York. To those who now see the magnificent squares and terraces on this spot called "Tyburnia," it is difficult to imagine that forty years ago the Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens were almost as wild and neglected as the place I am attempting to describe. This part of London for many years after 1832 remained in a most desolate condition; but at the end of Albion St., Hyde Park, a church was built, which for a long time was the solitary oasis in this desert of suburban solitude. This church, dedicated to St. John, belonged to the Parish of Paddington, and contained a small but effective organ by Bishop. The revival and improved method of organ building in England had not then commenced, and this most desirable consummation was undoubtedly initiated by Mendelssohn. My friend Mr. George Maxwell, a pupil of Hummel, and a most talented pianist and organist, was appointed to this church, and it was at my father's house that he first met Mendelssohn. A conversation happening to turn on the then existing organs in London, Mendelssohn expressed a wish to try the instrument in St.

John's. Compared with the large organs of the present day, this was a very poor affair. It possessed but one full Manual, and a Swell down to Tenor C, and was what is technically termed a G organ; that is, the Pedals commenced on G, instead of the now indispensable compass of C; and there was only a 16 ft. open Diapason in the Pedal Organ. Such were the small means placed at Mendelssohn's disposal, but he made the most of them, and many happy afternoons were spent in hearing his interpretation of Bach's Fugues, his wonderful extemporizing, and the performance of his own Sonatas, and other Organ pieces, then only existing in his memory. As the reports of these meetings became spread through the town, other and larger organs were placed at his disposal, and at St. Paul's Cathedral, Christ Church, Newgate St., St. Sepulchre's, and many other London churches he played on several occasions, giving the greatest delight to all who had the good fortune to hear him. I have heard most of the greatest organists of my time, both English, German and French, but in no respect have I ever known Mendelssohn excelled either in creative or executive ability, and it is hard to say which was the most extraordinary, his manipulation or his pedipulation,—for his feet were quite as active as his hands, and the independence of the former, being totally distinct from the latter, produced a result which at that time was quite unknown in England, and undoubtedly laid the foundation of a school of organ playing in Great Britain which has placed English organists on the highest point attainable in their profession.

After the production of "St. Paul" at Düsseldorf in 1836, Mendelssohn came again to London and was everywhere received with the greatest enthusiasm. His oratorio was hailed with delight as opening a new phase of the art; his appearance at the Philharmonic and other London concerts was the signal for crowded houses and enchanted audiences, and his presence at all social gatherings of his many private friends was the assurance of the certainty of most delightful evenings, where his geniality, his great kindness in displaying his extraordinary gifts, both in music and general accomplishments, were the very life and soul of the entertainment.

It was by no means an unnatural consequence that Mendelssohn's frequent visits to my family should have increased the longing aspirations I felt towards endeavoring to become a musician. Mendelssohn frequently listened to my attempts, and feeble as these were, he often gave me kind encouragement. Many years after I returned from Germany, I learned for the first time that it was by his advice my father made arrangements for me to go to Cassel, the capital of Hesse Cassel, which city during the Napoleon dynasty had been the metropolis of Westphalia, with Jerome Bonaparte as King. This town had always been celebrated for its opera and for the great men who had been its Kapellmeisters. The position of music-director had at one time been offered to Beethoven, but declined, as his friends refused to allow him to quit Vienna. Since 1822 Dr. Louis Spohr had been at the head of musical affairs, and at his instigation that most learned musical theorist, Moritz Hauptmann, joined Spohr in Cassel, and resided there until his appointment, some thirty years after 1824, as Cantor of the Thomas Schule in Leipzig, a post which had been formerly held by John Sebastian Bach, to whom Hauptmann was a most worthy and legitimate successor. Accordingly to Cassel I went and remained there for three years, having not only the advantage of the soundest theoretical studies with Hauptmann, but also of receiving much benefit from an intimacy with Spohr, which was of the greatest use to me, and which continued until his death. During these years of my art-apprenticeship I saw nothing of Mendelssohn. In those days railways were not in Germany, and travelling was difficult, expensive and fatiguing. He was, however, constantly in England, and especially in 1840 he went to Birmingham to conduct the "Hymn of Praise" for the first time. This visit was attended with the usual success, and when in London he was constantly with his own friends. In the winter of 1841, having so far completed my studies with Hauptmann, that I was, to use his expression, able to "run alone," I finished my residence in Germany by a long visit to Leipzig, and it was there that, having attained an age when I could observe "men, music and manners," and apply my observations to some purpose, I saw most of Mendelssohn, and became intimately acquainted with his artistic and social life. I shall not easily forget our first meeting on my arrival. The month was January, the cold intense; I had travelled all night through the bitter frost, and when in Leipzig, I went at once to the house of my friend, Ferdinand David, the brother of M^{me}. Dulcken, and a most excellent violinist and composer, one of Mendelssohn's most intimate friends. I was received most cordially by David, and on inquiring for Mendelssohn's house I was told that if I would wait half an hour I could see him, as he had fixed that day for seeing David on some business. The time had hardly expired when a ring was heard and the "Herr Doctor" appeared. I of course only saw the same familiar kind face that I knew so well, and I sprang forward to greet him. But what was my astonishment when I was received with the most frigid coldness. He drew himself up in his winter cloak, and said in German: "Sir, I have not the honor of your acquaintance." For a moment I was completely stunned, but happening to turn round I saw David was convulsed with laughter. I then for the first time recollected that, though Mendelssohn had remained unaltered, I, during three years, must have grown, like Tom Hood's wise pig, "quite out of knowledge," so that it was no wonder he did not recognize me; besides which, during the time I was in Cassel, I had heard no English, and had so completely learned the German language that I never thought of speaking anything else. The mystery was soon explained. Hardly had I told him my name, than Mendelssohn, who had been ice itself previously, thawed into the most genial sunshine of welcome, made a thousand inquiries after my studies, my prospects, and my intentions, made me free of his house, and immediately planned arrangements for giving me all the advantages that his high position in Leipzig placed at his disposal.

The first step Mendelssohn took was to find me most comfortable lodgings in the same house in which his sister-in-law, Madame Schunk, lived. This house was situated in Gerhard's Garten, in a most historical and interesting part of Leipzig, being close to the spot where Prince Poniatowski was killed, during the three days battle of Leipzig, in 1813. He then made me acquainted with three of his "children" as he called them, young men like myself, who were ambitious to become musicians. All of these friends have made their mark since that time. Carl Eckert is well known in Germany as an excellent composer and conductor, and is now, I believe, Musik-Director in his native city, Berlin. Ferdinand Kufferath is the principal resident musician in Brussels, and is highly esteemed by all who know him as very eminent in his profession. Julius Klengel, the son of a most respected violinist and professor in Leipzig, was the third friend to whom Mendelssohn introduced me. He was full of enthusiasm for the great "Bartholdy," and had, apart from his high musical acquirements, a great talent for poetry. All these friends are still living and flourishing, and should these lines ever meet their eyes, I trust they will reciprocate the hearty pleasure I feel in mentioning their names, and in recalling the pleasant days we passed under the direction and guidance of our dear friend and master.

Although it is by no means my intention to write anything like an autobiography, yet in endeavoring to give some account of my intimacy with Mendelssohn, it is unavoidable that I should constantly refer to myself and my life in connection with the subject I have attempted to illustrate. This I may safely say in extenuation of speaking in the first person. Any position that I have gained in my profession, was attained long after Mendelssohn's death. When I was with him I always felt in great awe of so eminent a man. I looked upon him with the same feeling with which a young lawyer holding his first brief might contemplate a Chief Justice of the highest Court of his own country. I could never play before him, or show him any of my crude early attempts at composition without thinking with what contempt he must look upon these puny efforts. I was always under the impression that, kind as he was, sympathizing as were all his ways, and great as were his wishes to do all in his power to render my life in Leipzig happy, he constantly thought that I had little or no talent for the path I had marked out for myself; and it was nearly eight years after he had gone to his rest, that by pure accident I obtained a proof in his own handwriting, that all along I had been in error.

At the time I was in Leipzig, the fame of Mendelssohn was at its zenith. He was director of the celebrated Gewandhaus Concerts. He was in constant consultation with the King of Prussia concerning the progress of music in Berlin. Leipzig was the centre of music during his life time. No artist of any repute as a composer, a performer, or a singer visited Germany without paying homage to Mendelssohn. His orchestra, though not numerically great, was certainly by far the best in the North of Germany, and its performances of all the greatest works, especially Beethoven's Symphonies, were celebrated as the most complete that up to that time (1841) had been given. The Gewandhaus concerts took place every Thursday from Michaelmas to Easter. The management of these was entrusted nominally to a committee, but the direction was really in the hands of Mendelssohn, David (the orchestral leader), and a most intimate friend of Mendelssohn, Schleinitz. The concert programmes, according to notions prevalent now-a-days, were short. The first part, as a rule, contained an overture, a vocal piece, either solo or concerted, and a pianoforte or violin concerto, or a solo with orchestral accompaniment on some other instrument. The second part invariably consisted of one Symphony. Thus the ear was not tired out by a selection of incongruous pieces, and the Symphony being placed at the last, the audience were not wearied by the length of the concert, and able to return home with a perfect sense of enjoyment of the feast of sound which had been so discriminately set before them. In addition to these full orchestral concerts there were two weekly rehearsals, and an evening devoted to Chamber Music, at which stringed Quartets, Trios, &c., formed the programme. These were also under Mendelssohn's direction, and he frequently played at them, but generally speaking young artists were allowed to appear, and both my friends Eckert and Kufferath had many opportunities of distinguishing themselves on the violin and piano. One great characteristic of Mendelssohn's disposition was his large-mindedness towards other musicians. Not only was his house and table open to all who knew him or brought letters to him, but his advice and in many cases his purse was at the disposal of all who required either; and had any artist written a work which pleased him, it was sure to find its way into the concert programmes without reference to the nation from which the composer sprang. Thus, Bennett and Macfarren as English writers, Miss Dolby and Mme. Clara Novello as English vocalists, Gade from Denmark, and a whole host of German composers were encouraged to write and appear, with the certainty of having an admirable interpretation of their works and performances under Mendelssohn's direction; and I have always considered that it is to his generosity and open-heartedness to my countrymen, as well as to his frequent visits to England, that the foundation of that large re-action in favor of classical music, especially as regards the whole of Sebastian Bach's works, and the later compositions of Beethoven, which has taken place within the last forty years in the British Empire, may be traced. When those who had the right to call themselves pupils of Mendelssohn, assert the fact, it must not be thought that he gave lessons in the ordinary acceptance of the word. In the first place I do not believe there is a single instance in which he received pecuniary recompense for his advice. Next, his instruction was not imparted in a formal manner. Speaking of myself as an example of the course he followed with others, I generally went to him three times a week. Previous to fixing an hour he would advise me to practice certain pieces, generally by Bach or Beethoven, and when I played them to him he would either criticize the performance, or more frequently play them to me. His favorite mode of giving advice was, however, by taking a walk during which he would invariably talk on musical subjects. One of his favorite haunts was a little Inn in a small forest near Leipzig, called the Rosenthal. I have frequently walked with him there, and during our wanderings he would invariably select for consideration a Symphony by Beethoven, an Opera of Mozart, or an Oratorio of Handel, or a Fugue of Bach. He would analyze these, point out the various beauties of their ideas, the ingenuity of their instrumentation, or the subtleness of their counterpoint in a most masterly manner. At the rehearsals of the Gewandhaus, to which all his pupils were free, he would always provide us with the scores of the larger works, and we had generally afterwards to undergo a pretty keen examination as to the construction and peculiarities of each. On one of the occasions of a visit to the Inn in the Rosenthal, I recollect a rather amusing incident. The weather was bitterly cold (it was February) and we had spent the afternoon in speaking of Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, and playing at billiards. In the course of the evening David joined us, and, it growing dark, we sat out on our journey home. Mendelssohn discovered in a cupboard of the billiard room some Dresden China dessert plates and dishes, which, as he was very fond of such things, he soon concluded to purchase. A bargain was completed with the landlady, and then came the question as to the conveyance of the acquisition to Leipzig. The ground was covered with hard frozen snow, and was very slippery. However, as Mendelssohn insisted on surprising his wife with the new present that evening, he took some of the plates, divided the rest between me and David, and we started in Indian file through the forest on our way home. We had many a hearty laugh at the difficulties of walking on the frozen ground without slipping, but Mendelssohn declared that if either David or I broke one of the plates by stumbling, he would immediately renounce our acquaintance! This of course was said in joke, but I must confess I was heartily relieved when we arrived safely with our burden at Mendelssohn's house, charmed Mme. Mendelssohn with the gift, and spent the rest of the evening laughing over the adventure.

I do not remember a single instance in which his compositions failed to meet with great and lasting success. I do not however think that full justice has yet been done to his marvellous powers as an executive musician. As an Organ and Pianoforte player he has never been excelled. His playing on the Organ has been already mentioned, but his management of the Piano was if possible still more marvellous. His mastery over the instrument was little short of miraculous. His powers of execution were quite as great as those of Rubinstein and Liszt; his delicacy of touch and tone was not exceeded by Thalberg or Chopin; and when to all these qualities are added the wonderful scope of his own mind in grasping the Pianoforte music of all schools, I do not in the least exaggerate when I assert that, of all pianoforte players of and since his time, Mendelssohn stands by far on the apex of greatness. During my stay in Leipzig various great pianists arrived on visits, and it was refreshing to observe the great attention paid them by Mendelssohn, the great deference and admiration showed to them by him, and the eagerness with which he sought to make himself acquainted with their peculiarities of style and method. One day I received a note from him asking me to come to dinner, as Thalberg had arrived the previous evening, and would be his guest. We were a trio, and after dinner Mendelssohn asked Thalberg if he had written anything new, whereupon Thalberg sat down to the piano and played his Fantasia from the "Sonnambula," then very recently composed, and in MS. This composition is one of the most individual and effective of all Thalberg's works. At the close there are several runs of Chromatic Octaves, which at that time had not previously been heard, and of which peculiar passages Thalberg was undoubtedly the inventor. Mendelssohn was much struck with the novel effect produced, and greatly admired its ingenuity. When we separated for the evening he told me to be with him the next afternoon at 2 o'clock. When I arrived at his study door I heard him playing to himself, and practising continually this passage which had so struck him the previous day. I waited for at least half an hour listening in wonderment to the facility with which he applied his own thoughts to the cleverness of Thalberg's mechanism, and then went into the room. He laughed and said: "Listen to this, is it not almost like Thalberg?"—and he proceeded to play all sorts of passages founded on these double scales. He never introduced the effect, however, in his writings; but the last "Lied ohne Worte" in Book 4, which he dedicated to my sister, Sophy Horsley (1st Edition published in London and Leipzig), contains an accompaniment somewhat founded on this idea, which was written about the time I am describing. Mendelssohn's life in Leipzig was that of a true artist. He was an early riser, and generally in his library by nine o'clock. He had a very large correspondence, both professional and private, and was most regular in answering all letters addressed to him. In accordance with German early hours the concert rehearsals were always in the forenoon, and his usual time for his own pursuits was after the early family dinner at 1 o'clock. His evenings, when not publicly engaged, were always spent with his wife and children.

Mendelssohn's home was truly happy. Mme. Mendelssohn was a charming lady, very beautiful in person and very accomplished in mind. She was devoted to him; of a calm, unexcitable temperament; and as he was of a precisely opposite disposition, the extremes in this case met to mutual advantage. His children were admirably brought up, and have now all become most excellent members of society, though strange to say, none have in the least inherited a taste for music. Perhaps this is well, as neither of his boys could have been placed in the position of Mozart's surviving son, who, though a really sound and learned musician, (this on Hauptmann's authority, who knew him in Milan) constantly complained of want of success in his profession, alleging as the reason, that the superlative greatness of his father caused every one to imagine it impossible that any scrap of the Mozartean mantle could have fallen on the shoulders of his son.

(Conclusion next time.)

Form in Music.

I.

In treating of this subject one is met at the outset by the fact that to the vast majority of the non-professional mind, even the meaning of our title is not fully comprehended, and yet "form" is an important essential which true music cannot dispense with. Hundreds of pseudo-composers rush into print, perfectly unconscious that there is such a thing as "form" in music. Whether the neglect of form by many of our writers is to be ascribed to what is termed in cant language "aspirations after liberty," or whether it is to be set down to modern superficiality, we are unable to determine. In comparing music with sister arts, one is forcibly reminded of the discrepancy of treatment which lies at the root of this evil. In painting, form meets us at the threshold of study. Before the tyro dares to think of imagery, color or effect, he must master the principles of outline, with its correlative study—perspective: without this all other branches are valueless. A picture may abound in creative art: yet, if it be faulty in geometrical consistency, if its perspective be irregular, in a word, if it wants form, it is simply ridiculous and intolerable. Whereas,—to adopt a reductio ad absurdum,—if a designer had drawn a dog's head on a man's body, or a fowl with four legs, with green sky and yellow grass, and yet had produced a picture in lineal and perspective completeness, the effect would offend a practical eye far less than if the subjects were badly drawn. Thus the comic designs of a Leech or a Tenniel satisfy even the connoisseur, because they comply with the requirements of form. In poetry, too, vivid conceptions, with unsymmetrical quantities, offend the practised eye in a moment; while completeness of proportion without powerful imagery is at once understood and accepted.

Yet, in music, this order is exactly reversed. The general public, including—we are sorry to say—too many in the profession, does not apprehend musical form at all. Ears are attuned to melodic and harmonic sounds, and minds to appreciate particular effects; but as to the general structure of a composition (what perspective is to drawing) no more idea exists than would be found in the inner consciousness of an Aztec or a Bushman. The general deficiency of sound musical education is the cause of this ignorance. An intending composer goes through a course of harmony; on ending which he fancies he can write, and forthwith rushes into print. Filled with vanity on finding himself "a composer," flattered also, perhaps, by friends and pupils, he produces sheets of vapid nonsense (author's property, let us hope for the publisher's sake), when really he is only on the first step of the ladder to musical proficiency. Harmony and counterpoint are necessary to the musical student, just as a knowledge of the properties of color is to the painter; but it is as absurd to assume that one educated only so far is a composer, as to suppose that a more student of shade blending is a painter. The evil, we repeat, is the assumption that the mere knowledge of harmony and counterpoint is any more than means to an end; and that one who is simply proficient in them has any pretension to being a composer without having studied musical form.

Form, then, lies at the threshold of the study of musical composition properly so called. Before the word "composer" can be fitly applied, the student must know the quantities of a phrase,—the phrases necessary to any particular movement; the characteristics of the various kinds of time,—and must be perfectly acquainted with the song, ballad, rondo, sonata, and symphonic forms. How many, even of popular composers have really mastered this part of the musician's art? Writers of songs, pianoforte pieces, anthems, services, cantatas, and operettas, spring up daily; yet how few obtain really permanent hold of the public mind or achieve anything like lasting reputation! We say to every aspirant to musical honors, in proportion to your acquirement of the principles of musical form, so will be your ultimate success as a composer; and, as sure as you neglect the acquirement of the principles of musical form, so sure will your name speedily pass into oblivion. We have in our mind's eye at this moment, a "composer" who has lately achieved much public notoriety through the sheer influence of advertising and over-confidence, (the Americans use a stronger word), but who has not yet mastered the simplest requirements of musical form. Of his popularity, like that of many others, it may truly be said:

Like Jonah's gourd, it sprang up in a day,
Like Jonah's gourd, so will it waste away.

We strongly advise every student to read Dr. Marx and other writers on this subject; and also to make our best classical works the subjects of close analysis. Not that we would have our composers mere imitators or stereotypers of forms, but that we wish to impress on them, with all the force of which we are capable, that true liberty of thought springs alone from the previous observance of rigid discipline.—*Mus. "St. Paul" in St. Paul's.

[The following curious article appears in the London Orchestra of Nov. 22. Although it treats of religious music from rather a conventional and ritualistic point of view, it tells some interesting facts about the hold which the intrinsically great, deep music is getting on the heart of the English people.]

The citizens of London are about to witness the revival of one of the very oldest institutions. In the time of 1270 the masters and scholars of St. Paul's School had made themselves famous for their enthusiasm and zeal in the performance of the sacred oratorio, a drama which in some measure may be considered as of English origin. There is direct record that in 1150 we, as a nation, were excessively fond of the sacred drama; and William Fitzstephen, the Norman monk of Canterbury, gives his tribute of praise to the English for their little care for the ordinary theatrical pieces in vogue, and for their great love for dramas of higher and holier import. Give them a play founded upon a miracle like that of St. Elizabeth or St. Columba, or one upon a noble martyrdom like that of St. Cecilia or St. Lawrence, they are mightily pleased withal, and yearn not for the pomps and vanities of the lower world. The monks of those days were wise in their day and time. They secured the people by giving them what they liked. They liked scene and music; the monks seized hold of both for the good of the Church and the good of their flock. Music to this day is against law in a parish church. Dr. Tait, our busy and anxious reformer in ecclesiastical matters, has never alluded to this fact in his variegated charges recently delivered in his diocese. Dr. Tait may leave the great Creed alone with advantage, for the orthodox, those who believe in the great doctrine of the Holy Trinity are satisfied with it, and Dr. Tait need not afford aid to unbelievers. They ask not for his help. But music may reasonably call for his support, because it is our Divine Leaders chief weapon in the armory of the Church. We recommend this thought to Dr. Wilberforce and to both houses of Convocation. Let the people of England have a common liberty with all Christendom. At present they have not. Any bishop, rector, vicar, or curate—nay, any churchwarden—can lock up the organ in a parish church and say—"There is your Prayer Book, without a note of music in it; stick to that and hold your tongue." Dr. Wilberforce and our Northern Archbishop, Dr. Thompson, who preach in the chapels or churches of John Knox, are in duty bound to give the fettered Englishman a law of liberty at least as large and free as that bestowed on the Scotsman. The Scot can claim for Divine service his metrical psalm; the Englishman cannot.

We need not inquire how it was that the early sacred oratorio died away in England. The monarch, the nobles, the colleges took away the money for Church music, and left the nation without any music for Sunday. Hence the English had no music for Monday or any of the other five days in the week. This was the sure operation of a higher law. Law against song for Sunday was law against all song worthy of the name. But the monarch retained music for his own royal self and grand court days, and state ceremonies in some degree preserved and fed the Church composer. In the days of Charles the First and our second Charles, the foreigner came here and gave our native musicians a useful lift, and with our Georges came the great Lutheran who had travelled through all Christendom and noted what the wisdom of the Church had supplied, and what the hearts of the people delighted in. Handel brought to life the sleeping taste for the oratorio. In the monkish time England patronized the musical plays of "The Good Samaritan," "Tobit and the Angel," "The Prodigal Son," "Joh and his Three Friends." Not distinctively to mention the Handelian oratorios, soon after the death of their composer were performed the oratorios, "Hannah," "Ruth," "Nabal," "Zinari," "Rebecca," "Alfred," "Judith," "The Prodigal Son," "Expulsion of the Demon from King Saul," "Abimelech," "Gideon," "Jephtha," "Force of Truth," and many others too numerous to mention. But all this effort for Church musical and Scriptural history was as Church music against law. The oratorio legally was the theatrical oratorio. Our bishops would listen complacently to oratorio music at Royal Coronations in Westminster Abbey, at Royal Concerts in His Majesty's Concert Room in Hanover Square, but if sought to be used in parish churches would fulminate their censures against it as so much show or sensational music—undevotional—fiddlers' music. In these days moral sense and common sense have beaten this prejudice, and the people ride over the law. Still there is the law—the scandalous law forbidding Church music, which an ill-natured bishop or rector with cure of souls may and can use, and this ought to be repealed and music set free.

The Church season now opening will be made memorable by a rendering of Mendelssohn's oratorio of "St. Paul" in St. Paul's Cathedral; a Passion Service, that by Sebastian Bach, the St. Matthew history, in St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey; a Passion Service in the Church of St. Anne, Soho, that by Sebastian Bach according to the history of St. John; Handel's oratorio of "Thursara, the Martyr of Antioch," in the Hanover Square Rooms; and the oratorio of "Belshazzar," by Handel, in St. James's Hall. We rejoice to be able to record these introductions of "the orchestra in churches," and it is both our pleasure and duty to award the meed of praise to the deans of St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey, for this glorious issue. For years we have been contesting the point and the principle, and at last "the orchestra in church" is a recognized fact. But it is the people of England that have done this great thing. It is the sympathy of the amateur mind with the artistic mind, and the reverence of both for the Bible histories, and the prevalence of the old Catholic faith throughout this great nation.

The St. Matthew "Passion" will probably be given in Exeter Hall by the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society. The Bach is being remodelled [!] by Sir Michael Costa, and no doubt it will prove a great attraction, the Costa mind being so differently constituted [!] from that of Herr Franz, whose score has hitherto been adopted in the performance of this composition in this country. We have for many years given it as our opinion that the Bach "Passion according to St. John" is the real rendering to work in this country. The oratorio is more scriptural and less encumbered by interruptions, the style more condensed, the form more simple, the melodies more attractive, the feelings more sym-thetic. Possibly it might be improved by a few additions from the St. Matthew "Passion." Some few of the short and highly dramatic choruses would bear transplantation, and the "Thunders and Lightnings" would beyond question add much to the interest of the shorter work.

The oratorio of "The Passion," when properly set to music, must present the first and most essential feature of all dramatic composition—that of deep personal feeling. The vocalists sing the belief of the musicians in the narrative contained in the biographical statement of the Evangelist. Whatever of emotion may arise from the beautiful or sublime character of the music, persuaded belief lies at the bottom of all. And the cause—the basis of this revival of English love for the drama of the Passion, of which we have records for seven hundred years past, is the revived and increased faith in the great mass of the English nation. The people have called for the oratorio of "The Passion" just as they call for Handel's "Messiah"; they have Handel, and they demand Bach. It is no question of art, of service, of adoration, but it is the conviction all round that the grandest of music can never enter the heart or intellect of the composer unless associated with the grandest of all themes that can fill the human being. The same belief which called for the drama of the Crucifixion in England in 1150, in 1370, in Rome in 1264, in Padua in 1243, in Friuli in 1298, in France in 1300, in Germany in 1320, and which led Luther to retain the service in 1530, is now strong and mighty in this country, and the hearers of this drama are becoming daily more and more numerous. Every young man of ordinary respectability is now a singer, and can read choral music. There is not an English girl, decently educated, but can take her part in an oratorio. Nothing short of the true, the real, the beautiful, can satisfy the young heart when engaged with oratorio music; youth yearns for this, and finds it in the Passion music of Handel and Bach. For this cause we find their music at St. Paul's Cathedral, in Westminster Abbey, and as a corollary, the "St. Paul" of Mendelssohn.

We cannot but deplore the discontinuance of the sacred concerts given in the Royal Albert Hall by M. Gounod, concerts in many respects most remarkable, attended with great artistic results. M. Gounod has taught our amateur to sing in pure and sustained tone high class music unaccompanied by either organ or orchestra. He is in many respects the foremost musician of the age, and the only one to be coupled with the illustrious [!] Verdi, but he has been most grievously ill advised by those who know nothing of English tastes and English feeling. His artistic virtues are manifold, his errors comparatively small and few. But he did this—he dressed his choir, put the girls in proper paraphernalia—white, red and blue; and before long we hope to see at all such gatherings the girls in white, the men in surplices,* and the band in crimson cassocks and the black sash. Nothing short of this at the large concerts at Exeter Hall, nothing short of this at the bigger festivals at the Royal Albert Hall. The public will at once perceive the propriety and beauty of the change, and bestow their patronage on those who so wisely and artistically call upon them for the preference. No one wants the choir of a thousand voices, the men standing up like so many ministers and deacons in a Dissenting chapel, and the girls like those in a flower manufactory, or where paper collars and dickeys are made, or the sewing machines kept all a going. The public really wants a change in these sumptuary arrangements, and will willingly pay for it.

Mendelssohn's Death.

[The Kölnische Zeitung has been enabled to give the following extract from the second volume of "Moscheles's Life," by Mrs. MOSCHELES, now in the press:]

On the 17th of September (Moscheles writes in his journal) the Mendelssohn family returned from Switzerland. Mentally our delightful friend is just the same, but physically he seems to me changed; he has aged, he is languid, and his walk is less quick than it used to be. And yet if one sees him at the piano, or hears him talking about art and artists, he is all life and fire. His friend Julius Rietz is just entering on his post of Capellmeister at Leipzig, and that is a great delight to him. "There's another," said Mendelssohn, "who really loves good music, who can produce good things himself, and can bring the productions of others to the highest pitch of perfection, and now the Gewandhaus concerts will have quite the genuine ring about them. And then what quantities of music we will have at home! Rietz plays the 'cello so well, it will be a splendid winter." * * *

On the 9th of October Mendelssohn called for Charlotte and me to take a walk with him; we saw him coming slowly and languidly through the garden to the house. When my wife affectionately asked him how he felt, he answered: "How I feel? Well, I feel all gray in gray." She tried to cheer him by saying that the sunny weather and the walk would do him good. And really, during our stroll through the Rosenthal, he became so bright and lively that we forgot his indisposition. He told us about his last stay in London—his visit to the Queen; how prettily she had sung to him, when he had played to her and the Prince; how she had then said in such a kind manner: "He had so often given her pleasure, was there no way of giving him any?" how he had begged to see the children, and she had conducted him into the beautifully arranged nursery department and shown him the little princes and princesses, all so well brought up and so good that it was quite a treat to see them. Then he spoke about his wife's coming birthday, for which occasion he had bought her a cloak. Another invaluable present he had also himself prepared for her for this birthday. On a tour that he and Klingemann had made in Scotland they kept a journal together, Klingemann writing verses, Mendelssohn drawing. These hasty sketches he has now worked out, collected, and bound together, but when he presented this gift to his wife, hoping to please her with it, he was already at death's door!

We separated (continues the journal) at about one o'clock, in the best spirits. But already that same afternoon, in the Fröge's house, he became very unwell.

He had gone there to try and again persuade Frau Fröge, that artist whom he so highly esteemed, to sing in the approaching performance of "Elijah." "She shrinks from appearing in public," he had said to us a few days previously, "because she has been suffering a great deal from her throat; but nobody can sing it as she does; I must inspire her with courage." The literal account which here follows his visit to Frau Fröge on the 9th of October, we owe to a personal communication. He entered the room with these words: "I am coming to-day, and every day, till you give me your consent, and now I bring you again the altered pieces (of 'Elijah')." But I feel dreadfully low-spirited, so much so that I actually cried the other day over my trio. But, before the 'Elijah,' you must to-day help me to put together a collection of songs; Bartels are pressing me so much for it." He had brought the set, op. 71, and as the 7th song, the "Alt-deutsche Frühlingslied," which he had already composed in the summer of this year, but only written out on the 7th of October. "I knew," said Frau Fröge, "about in what order he would arrange them, and laid them out on the piano one by one. When I had sung the first he was greatly moved and asked for it again, and added: 'That was a serious birthday present for Schleinitz on the first of October; but it is just how I feel myself, and I cannot tell you how sad it made me to see Fanny's still unaltered rooms in Berlin. And yet I have so much to thank God for—Cécile is so well, and the little Felix (his youngest son and a delicate child) too.' I had to sing all the songs several times, and stuck to the point that the 'Frühlingslied' did not seem to go very well with that set. So he said: 'Very well. The whole set looks serious; let it go forth into the world as it is.' Though he looked very pale, I had to sing him the first song for the third time, and he said all kinds of nice and affectionate things to me about it. Then he asked: 'If you are not too tired, couldn't we just sing the last quartet out of 'Elijah'?' I went out of the room to order lights, and when I came back he was sitting in the other room in the sofa-corner, and said his hands had got quite stiff and cold, and he thought he would rather be well-advised and just take a run round the town, for he felt too bad to play properly. When he got into the open air he felt it was best to go straight home, and there sat down in the sofa-corner, where Cécile found him again at seven o'clock, his hands again quite benumbed."

THE NEXT DAY

the doctor applied leeches to relieve the severe headache from which he was suffering; he took it for disorder of the stomach, and it was only much later that he declared it to be an excessive irritation of the nervous system. I had for a long time—even before Fanny's death—been struck by his paleness when he was conducting or playing—everything seemed to tire him more than formerly. The whole town was terror-struck, his friends trembled, when the news of his illness spread abroad, but when he began to amend they again believed in his ultimate recovery. A few days afterwards he received visits from his friends, was in good spirits, and made plan after plan. He even wanted to go to Vienna to fulfil his promise of conducting the "Elijah," but his friends dissuaded him from this exertion. To Frau Frege, who went to see him, he said: "Well, I gave you a pretty fright; I must have been a cheerful looking object." By degrees the convalescent felt better and better, and was allowed on the 28th to take a walk with his wife. He even wanted to go out again, but the careful wife persuaded him to rest, and he consented; and, alas! immediately afterwards he sank down. They called it paralysis. The anxiety and sadness of the next days cannot be described. The whole town shared it with relations and friends. Once more an apparent improvement showed itself, but he soon became highly excited, and began talking English wildly; and on the 3rd of November, at half-past two, he had a third attack, which completely shattered his senses. The bulletin is besieged, but the news which it gives tells of no improvement, and so the 4th of November draws nearer.

* Herz's "Ritualien" with a vengeance!—Ed.

Midday.—The physicians, Dr. Hammer, Hofrath Carus, and surgeon Walther, are with the patient by turns. The bulletin which Schleinitz writes declares the case to be hopeless. Herr and Frau Frege, David, Rietz, Schleinitz, my wife and I, remained anxiously near the sick room. The only words of encouragement that the doctors can give are these: "If there should be no fresh attack, the seeming quiet may bring about a happy change, and he may be saved." But this repose was only the result of the decline of his physical strength.

Evening.—From 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when a repetition of the attack was feared at the same hour as the day before, utter unconsciousness set in. All the more delicate organs and mental powers were gone, and he lay quiet, breathing loud and heavily. In the evening we were all assembled around his bed, without fearing a disturbance; his angelically peaceful countenance, the stamp of his immortal soul, impressed itself deeply and indelibly on our spirits. His Cécile bore the terrible weight of her grief heroically—she never once broke down, not a word betrayed her inner suffering. His brother Paul, like a moving marble statue, was continually at his bedside. This tragic scene was still heightened by the vainly expected arrival of his sister, Frau Dirichlet, and his relations, Herr and Frau Schunck. Dr. Härtel had gone off to Berlin to fetch her, and also Dr. Schönlein; but they did not come. From nine in the evening the fatal end began to approach, and the breathing became slower. The doctors counted the respirations as if they wanted to enrich science with new discoveries; his features became transfigured; Cécile knelt by his bedside, suffused in tears; and in the deathly silence Paul Mendelssohn, David, Schleinitz, and I surrounded the bed, in earnest prayer. With every breath that escaped from him, I felt the struggle of the great spirit which was breaking loose from its mortal frame. At twenty-four minutes past nine he breathed out his great soul with a deep sigh. The doctor took Cécile into another room, and supported her in her speechless grief. I knelt by the bed, accompanying the soul of the departed one to heaven with my prayers, and kissed the lofty brow before it had grown cold under the hand of death. We remained some hours together, bewailing the irreparable loss, and then each one retired, with his grief. His children had been sent to bed at nine, and were already sleeping calmly when God called their father to Himself. Even the awful solemnity of the funeral celebration can never come up to the feelings which overpowered me then, and which I shall always carry about with me in remembrance of that beloved friend, a man beyond the possibility of ever being replaced. The whole city mourned, the Gewandhaus had no concert on the 4th of November as usual—and who would have gone to listen to it? That one broken chord had taken the tune out of our own souls.

Dr. Bellows on Rubinstein.

We have among us now a great musician, a fine composer, and an astonishing performer—Rubinstein. As has drawn to himself a great following of admirers, and has already been seen and heard enough to make an American estimate of him, at least, possible. The first glance at him went far to settle his claims to respectful attention. A broad, ample forehead—indeed, of enormous width—backed by a capacious brain, over eyes large and sad, with high cheek-bones, full of Tartar and Oriental suggestion; a mouth large, sensuous, flexible, but unsmiling and semi-barbaric—such as an Indian chief might wear; gleaming teeth; a strong neck; firm limbs, squarely planted; large hands; a full circulation; a ruddy, even color from brow to finger tips—you have a physique compact, vigorous, full-blooded, and indicative of health and the prime of life. His smooth-shaven face gives only more effect to his copious and strong hair, which he shakes as a lion his mane. In public he is grave, reserved, and distant, treating his audiences with a fine disdain or a fine respect, not always easily distinguished. Clearly he comes neither to beg mercy nor propitiate praise. He seems to take this position: "I offer you my best, for which you have paid your money; and you owe me nothing and I owe you nothing further in this little business transaction, which satisfies us both. And as for gratuitous applause, it pleases me, because it shows sympathy with the music I interpret or the way I interpret it. But I have had the favorable judgment of Liszt and Joachim and of musical capitals and select circles on that, and cannot lay much stress upon it; and am too honest and grave to affect a gratitude I do not feel." The fact is, Rubinstein is too large and serious a personality to be tossed on the ripples of concert-room applause. You feel it to be a sort of indignity to make a show of him and fasten eyes as upon a public performer. When a great orator is pleading a serious and pregnant cause, you do not call him or think him a performer; and when a true artist moves us in the universal direction we forget alike him and ourselves. It is an impertinence to emphasize either his presence or his implements or our admiration and interest. We ought to be lost in the enjoyment or vision of the great realities his art evokes. We reverence the artist most who makes us forget himself in the greatness and glory of his theme, and ourselves in the attraction of his subject.

And this is really the finest tribute Rubinstein compels his audiences to pay—their silence and their restrained applause. His companion, an excellent violinist, but evidently not an inspired man, evokes a stormy applause. The people feel they can and must settle with him on the spot. Open and hearty admiration will pay off his claims in full. He is within reach of the palms. His skill is great, but only of a kind we know and can measure. He is master of all the tricks of his instrument; and the people respect, admire and appreciate his tricks. They deserve applause, and let them have it. But what can applause do for one of Handel's sacred songs ("I know that my Redeemer liveth"), or for Beethoven's dirge in the Seventh Symphony, or for Schumann's best lyrics, or for Rubinstein's deep and subtle concertos? The people evidently feel this, and it is a good sign. It shows his mettle and theirs.

For really it is not what Rubinstein writes or plays that is the best part of him. It is what he is. His compositions and his performances indicate a mind full of original and earnest thoughts, of serious struggles with the spiritual and social problem of the time, of a yearning toward divine beauty, truth, and peace. He is a strong child who has carried his youth with him into his maturity, and lost nothing of the questful gaze and serious curiosity of a first-awakened soul. And clearly, although a man of thought and culture, acquainted with European life, he has much of that Oriental and mystical charm which made Kossuth a sort of poet-prophet-statesman, and gave his utterance, even in a foreign tongue, an eloquence and charm quite unique and unparalleled. We hear the Orient in the solemn and hushed tone, the mystic and half-fatalistic quality, the dreamy and unfamiliar and unpractical essence of his music; but it is the East at its confluence with the West! Rubinstein is on the isthmus that divides the Orient and the Occident. Their spray dashes over into each other; but they do not mix. There is an evident conflict and struggle in his nature and his music. He roars like a lion and is soft as a sucking dove by turns. He springs like a panther, and with his grace and precision, upon the keys. But his hands are claws in velvet. They smite like a hammer, they caress like a mother. But there is a grave moodiness, an unsatisfied seeking, and baffled longing in his characteristic style and manner, which makes it wondrous true to our time of broken relations, when the past has gone and the future has not come, when we are dissatisfied with what is and not clear what is to be.—Independent, Dec. 7th.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 30.—(Crowded out last time.)

On Tuesday the "Elijah" was repeated by the Handel and Haydn Society, with Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Fairman, Mr. Simpson and Mr. Whitney. The choruses were given with rather better spirit than at the last performance. "Thanks be to God," and "He watching over" were particularly good. The orchestra was bad. Mr. Whitney seemed to be suffering from hoarseness, but it did not interfere much with his singing. His rendering of "I have been very jealous" was most excellent, far better than the opening part of the solo. Miss Fairman was eminently successful in her part and received a hearty encore of "O rest in the Lord." Mr. Simpson was only passable in his solos. He sadly wants vim. Mme. Rudersdorff sang with her accustomed dramatic power. "Cast thy Burden" was beautifully sung and was, of course, encored. On Thursday evening "The Messiah" was given before a tremendous audience. The same singers participated as on Tuesday. Mr. Whitney's performance throughout was grand. I never heard more eloquent singing than his "Why do the heathen?" In "The trumpet shall sound" he was somewhat fettered by the acrobatic performances of the orchestra. Mme. Rudersdorff was ill, and her performance was not entirely satisfactory. "Rejoice greatly" was quite beyond her vocal powers. But her conception of "I know that my Redeemer" is eminently worthy. Miss Fairman sang well, as usual, but the alto solos in the "Messiah" are difficult for most female altos to sing. Mr. Simpson took "Comfort ye" twice as slow as it ought to be; and "Thou shalt dash them" was beyond his vocal ability. The choruses were excellent, but the orchestra terrible.

Dec. 14.—On the afternoon of Saturday, the 30th ult., Mr. Wolfsohn gave his third orchestral Matinée. Mendelssohn's A-major ("Italian") Symphony headed the programme. The Andante con moto did not receive as smooth a performance as would have pleased a fastidious critic; but, considering the enormous difficulties Mr. Wolfsohn has to contend with, the whole work was very well interpreted. Wagner's superb "Rienzi" Overture was nobly given. Mr. Wolfsohn played Liszt's "Slumber Song" with that delicacy and taste which characterizes all his performances of music of this nature. Mr. Braun gave a creditable interpretation to a Fantasia for the cello by Piatto on Der Freyschütz.

On Saturday evening the "Orpheus Club," a male singing society of twenty voices, led by Mr. Michael Cross, gave their first concert. The principal piece was an old English Prize Glee, written in 1811, by C. Evans, and entitled "Beauties, have you seen a toy?" It was exceedingly well sung, but the upper tenor part was not prominent enough. Moehring's "Cavalry Song" was sung with great spirit and accuracy. Abt's "Good night, Beloved," for solo baritone and humming chorus was well received; but the gentleman who sang the solo has a bad method in that he forces his chest voice too high. The rest of the vocal part of the programme were tastefully sung. The only fault which seemed to be continual was that the second bass part did not assert itself sufficiently. Mr. Jarvis played Chopin's F-sharp minor "Impromptu" and Etude in A minor, and Thalberg's "Elisire d'Amore."

On Monday, the 9th, Mrs. Moulton sang at a concert given for a charitable purpose at Horticultural Hall. Her solos were Massé's "Ma mere était Bohémienne," Schubert's "Erl King" and Dolby's "Splendid weather." She was eminently successful, particularly in the last named piece. Her vocalization is perfect, and her appreciation of the sentiment of her song is so good that it is a thorough pleasure to hear her.

Mr. Wolfsohn's 4th matinée was given this afternoon. Beethoven's No. 4 (B-flat) was the Symphony selected. It was only fairly given, the wooden wind instruments being the clog to its perfect performance. Mr. Rosewald, of Baltimore, played Spohr's violin Concerto (No. 8) exceedingly well, and he was finely supported by the orchestra. On Monday Lucca opens a season of two weeks.

EUSTACE.

Dec. 21.—Last Saturday evening the "Abt Male Singing Society" gave its first concert of this season at Musical Fund Hall. The hall was densely filled by a brilliant audience, which manifested great enthusiasm. The programme was rich and judiciously varied, and every piece was rendered with that precision and crispness of tone which has ever characterized the society's performances. Sullivan's "Long Day closer" was most exquisitely sung, and Gade's "Gondola Song" was a perfect example of pianissimo singing. Storch's "March" received a loud encore, as did also Hatton's "Letter." The "Village Blacksmith" by Hatton was a fitting close to this brilliant concert. I should not omit to mention the great improvement in the quartet singing at this concert over the former efforts of the Society in this line. Mr. Clarke, the conductor, and the entire Society are to be sincerely congratulated on the success of this concert, which was the undoubted result of their hearty and earnest labor in rehearsing.

On Monday, the 16th, the "Lucca Troupe" opened their season at the Academy. "Faust" was selected as the opera in which to introduce to us the great prima donna. The "Marguerite" of Mme. Lucca is certainly one of the most perfect specimens of histrionic force I have ever witnessed. She throws her whole soul into the part, and this, combined with her passionately powerful voice, has made her so preëminently successful. Her childish delight in the "Jewel Song," and her dark despair in the church scene, are as different as if each were portrayed by a different artiste. Mona. Jamet as Mephisto was, in singing and acting, entirely satisfactory. Sig. Viziani in the title role did not do well, his voice is too light for the heavy orchestration of the work.

On Tuesday, Miss Kellogg was the recipient of a great ovation on her appearing as "Leonora" in "Trovatore." Throughout the whole opera she gave strong evidence that her voice is greatly improved in strength, and yet is losing none of its silvery sweetness; her acting too was very good, not as stormy as Gazzaniga's, but all the part requires. Sig. Abrudegno as "Manrico" sang and acted fairly. His voice is somewhat worn and sounds rather tame after Wachtel and Lefranc. Sig. Moriama as the "Count" was exceedingly good.

On Wednesday the "Huguenots" was given. Mme. Lucca as "Valentino" sang the difficult music with charming facility, and rendered all her recitatives with great dramatic effect. In the 4th act her scene with "Raoul" was superbly acted. Sig. Viziani as "Raoul" failed almost entirely; the music is far beyond his ability, and his acting was quite stiff. Jamet as "Marcel" sang with great taste, but the part is too low for his voice. Mme. Leveille as "Margaret," and Sig. Sparani as "Nevers" were quite successful in their impersonations.

On Thursday "Crispino e la Comare" was the opera. Ronconi, as the lucky cobbler, sang far better than I have heard him for years, and his acting, of course, was irresistibly funny. Miss Kellogg, though harassed by a severe cold, played her part as of old, with naïveté and brilliancy.

On Friday evening "The Marriage of Figaro" was announced, but owing to Miss Kellogg's increased illness, could not be performed, and "Fra Diavolo" was substituted. Mme. Lucca as "Zerlina" was perfectly bewitching: she is certainly a marvel, so wide is the scope of her histrionic abilities. Viziani as "Fra Diavolo" sang as well as he can with his feeble voice, and his acting was quite satisfactory. Ronconi as "Milord" provoked much applause. The chorus of the troupe is fair, but the orchestra is not as unwavering as it should be. Next week is the last of this troupe's season here.

BOSTON, DEC. 28, 1872.

The Christmas Oratorio.

Our people have learned to look forward to a performance of Handel's "Messiah" as regularly and as joyfully as to the return of Christmas. To musicians, and to those of much experience in the hearing of great music, something a little more out of the common, even if not so great,—a Bach's Weihnachts Oratorium for instance,—might for once awaken a more eager appetite; but for the great mass whose musical range is limited, although they may love music deeply, and who can feel how vital and profound the harmony between the Handelian inspirations and the significance which the season of the Nativity has to all religious souls, there is no musical work which means so much and is so well appreciated, so strengthening and uplifting as "The Messiah." We are apt to forget, too, that there is always a younger generation coming on, who would be wronged by deprivation of the glorious opportunity we older ones have had far oftener than we deserved. But then again, upon the other hand, even the most experienced, just when they turn again with some reluctance and anticipation of fatigue to the long series of mighty choruses and songs too great for singers uninspired, are often forced to wonder at themselves, as well as at the great composer's genius, when, to their agreeable disappointment (probably not for the first time) they find how fresh it all sounds after all, how grander than ever and more marvellously perfect every chorus proves, and what new beauty and only half-suspected truth and depth of feeling still reveals itself in every Air and Recitative, and every bit of symphony. Many will own that this was signally the case with them last Sunday evening, and well appreciated this sturdy conservatism of the old Handel and Haydn Society, whatever else they may be disposed to ask for at its hands.

Last year's performance of the Messiah received unwonted lustre from the participation of the Santley party as soloists, and their presence inspired the chorus singers with a new ambition; so that the crowded audience this time came prepared to measure things by a high standard. In justice we must own that the choral work was even better than before, and that we do not remember so satisfactory a rendering of the whole series of choruses in Boston. Even those difficult and "catchy" ones, "Good will towards men," "His yoke is easy," (the singers seldom found it easy!), and the like, were clearly made out both in general outline and detail. The tenderly affecting choruses: "Surely" and "With his stripes," in which Handel more resembles Bach, as well as the completion of the group in the bold contrast of "All we like sheep," with the sublime and awe-inspiring conclusion; "And the Lord hath laid on him," were adequately realized. The altos were very rich and full, and the tenors came out with freshness and vitality of tone, as well as sweetness, which has been very rare. The sopranos were efficient, but sometimes rather thin and screamy on the high notes. This was particularly noticeable, as usual, in the "Hallelujah" chorus, otherwise so perfect, where the high A falls on the pinched vowel e: "And He shall reign." Mr. ZERRAUX suggests (and why not?) that henceforth they sing: "The Lord shall reign." But better yet would be the return to the lower pitch, the French normal pitch; and even that is more than half a tone sharper than the pitch of Handel's time. Some choruses were omitted,—wisely, considering the great length of the work. The orchestra did their part, as is too often the case in such tasks, rather perfunctorily and as if their thoughts were wandering outside of the music; not always, but too frequently, as now and then a solo singer must have felt. The Organ, under Mr. Lano's hands, was a great help.

The quartet of soloists were all interesting, to say the least. At the opening, the Tenor, Mr. PACKARD, placed himself at once in a worthy light as an interpreter of a high theme, and as a performing artist before a public somewhat critical. His delivery of "Comfort ye" and "Every Valley" was a very careful, well considered and consistent effort; in spirit and conception right and adequate. His voice is sweet and of good even calibre throughout, not brilliant but of fair power, and his method excellent. He sustains a tone and swells it admirably. Indeed he has style, and a pure and honest style, free from offensive crudities, affectations or exaggerations. He plainly had a full appreciation of his task and did it earnestly and like an artist. A little stiffness, which should disappear with practice, was about the only drawback.—The Bass came next in requisition, Mr. Whitney for "Thus saith the Lord" and the Air: "But who may abide." And here again at once was a great step forward into public favor. His majestic organ seemed to have ripened and expanded and become vivified through the whole range of it; alike in declamation, in Cantabile, in clear, rotund and even execution of the long roulades, he was more satisfactory than ever. There was less dead wood in the performance; it was all alive. He does not yet possess, however, like the Tenor, the art or power of holding out a long tone without wavering in the pitch, and not unfrequently, after a manly and victorious tussle with a trying passage, comes out on a strong last note a little false. These ponderous basses yield to their own weight, we know. But the impression as a whole was grand. "For He is like a refiner's fire" was given with great energy. This solemn warning ended, with the chorus, that so fitly follows: "He shall purify," it is the Contralto's turn, announcing the Nativity, proclaiming the new light. Mlle. ANNA DRANDIL, a native of Bohemia, who has lived for several years in England, a pupil for some time of Mme. Rudersdorff, has made a great mark in the Oratorio there, and it has been a common thing of late to hear her mentioned as the most promising Contralto in England. Her very first tones: "Behold! a virgin," arrested unusual attention by the individual timbre of the voice, at once rich and reedy, sweet, yet with a singularly penetrating quality. It reached everywhere, and there was a rare charm about it. A true artistic singer was soon manifest; well trained; with something like a genius for it, as it seemed; dramatic too, and full of fire. There was probably some nervousness in that first effort; for in the Air: "O thou that tellest," the lower portion of the voice seemed weak, and the force of certain phrases spent before all the notes had reached the ear. But this was the beginning only; we shall hear more; now we have to listen to another voice, which should be in this Oratorio the voice of voices, the Soprano.

Prepared by all these voices, of prophecy and warning and announcement, and by the Overture and thrilling choruses,—prepared too by that exquisite prelude of the Pastoral Symphony (in the performance of which we must again protest against that poor infringement of the Thomas "Trémolo" patent, that hushing of the last repetition to a half audible ppp),—now begins the voice which is to embody as it were the Light to which all has been looking forward, and I to sing the great song of Faith. This time it is the lovely voice of Mrs. MOUTON. With all her good gifts the singer is not in her element; for she has never sung in Oratorio before and never even heard a full performance of the Messiah. She brings to it all her treasury of nightingale and lark-like tones, with the spontaneous, bird-like springing forth thereof (though sometimes there seems to be a struggle in the throat before the nightingale escape); all her finished, fluent vocalization; her versatility of talent and quick apprehension. Nor does she approach the task with levity, or without a sense of its importance, or without earnest preparation. Indeed the nervousness apparent at the first was quite sincere; and this, added to a cold, entitled her to large allowance. Under the circumstances, the degree of success which she achieved was certainly remarkable. The effort won respect throughout, while more than once it charmed and satisfied in a high sense. The Recitative: "There were Shepherds" was not so simply given as one could wish: there was a somewhat forced, unneeded pathos in its tones; just in that narrative, recited as it were from heaven, the Voice should be impersonal, though human,—by no means dramatic. "Rejoice greatly" was in her true vein, and seldom have we heard it sung more beautifully: the serious middle strain, too, was tenderly melodious. Best of all was "Come unto Him," which seemed to reach the heart of the audience. Her rendering of the great air: "I know that my Redeemer" was an earnest, very creditable effort,—one that raised her in her character of artist,—but not yet a triumph. Here too there was a somewhat trammelled and uneasy leaning on traditions (not always of the best), and not that free, assured and noble style,—sure, simple and sublime,—by which that song has maintained its supremacy. But Mrs. Mouton is full of song and full of talent. If a Parisian life could not imbue her with the Oratorio style or spirit, we trust it is not too late for her to learn, and that she will not cease to try her powers in the high spheres of Art. Paulo majora canamus!

We can only add that Miss Drusdil's voice and style and earnestness grew upon the audience as she went on. What seemed the feeble tones came out clear and ringing. "He was dismissed" was so impressive and rendered that we felt wronged by the omission of the second part. Mr. Packard sustained himself throughout as honorably as he began; giving "Thy rebuke," &c., with true manly pathos; though he is not yet full grown, even if he be by nature framed, for the severe task of vocalization offered by "Thou shalt break them." His voice is not a ringing one, although it had a manly power and value, besides sweetness. Mr. Whitney continued to give us of his grandest sub-bass as well as his most pure and ringing upper tones, making every piece effective, particularly "Why do the nations rage" and "The trumpet shall sound," in which the startling clear tone and crisp, pure execution of a new trumpet-player won instant recognition.

Mr. A. P. Peck's Concerts.—In the line of miscellaneous, popular concerts, combining always quite a galaxy of "stars," nobody caters half so well as our obliging superintendent of the Music Hall. But this year other "stars in their courses" seem to have "fought against" him. Two of his four rich announcements were fulfilled, to his loss, during the horse epidemic; then came the Great Fire, compelling the indefinite postponement of the other two. But last week Mr. Peck redeemed his promise to the public, on a more generous scale than had been even thought of; for besides Mrs. Charles Moulton, he offered us Theodore Thomas with his Orchestra, and all the brilliant soloists who travel with him. The programmes, too, were of a high order, of interest to any audience; few better are found in the record of the Thomas concerta.

But again the elements could not conceal their grudge; vilest of wintry days was Friday, Dec. 20. The only wonder was that so many people waded through the snow and sleet to the warm bright Music Hall, filling it more than half full. Bronze Beethoven's face shone well; and never could there have been complete contrast with the outer world, or sweeter and more timely cheer, than one felt at the first sound of that very tune of Summer, the opening phrase of the Pastoral Symphony, a theme which seems to have dropped from heaven out of a clear blue June sky, into the composer's most imaginative, prolific brain. This time Mr. Thomas gave us the whole Symphony; and in such a setting,—after the Allegro representing “the awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country,” which the listening tone-poet stole from the very pulse and breath of Nature,—the “Scene by the Brook” (Andante molto moto) was far more appreciable. The “Thunder Storm” episode was given with startling vividness and power; the Scherzo (“merry meeting of peasants”), which it interrupts, was finely exhilarating with its crisp, delicate staccato, and most rousing when it came to the boisterous swing of the heavy country dance. The sunshine after storm, with the homeward tramp of the flocks, and the rich hymn of joy and gratitude, in the Finale, were for the most part well brought out, although the movement (Allegretto) was rather rapid for the clear outlining of some passages.

Mrs. MOULTRON's smooth, delicious voice, and exquisitely fluent, facile execution, in the rapid, florid violin Variations of Rode's Air were so wholly musical, and so held the listening sense enchanted, that few suspected that she was suffering from a cold. The Air itself was given in a true and broad cantabile style, and the Variations lacked no airy grace or finesse. Earnestly recalled, she sang a pretty, playful English ballad (by Mme. Dolby, is it): "Don't you think the Summer is better than the Spring?" &c., &c., quite in the humor of the thing. Miss MEHLIG followed with Weber's Concertstueck,—which, with all its brilliancy and genius, sooner or later comes to one as a production on the uncertain border ground between the classical Concerto and the cheral de bataille of concert virtuosos,—but in which every musical person has found pleasure more than once. Of course it suffered very little in the execution, although the fair pianist seemed not in her best strength and spirits.

Part II, was as follows:

Overture, 'Merry Wives of Windsor'.....	Nicolai.
Song, 'Ask me not,' composed expressly for.....	F. Abt.
Concerto for Violoncello.....	Mr. George L. Osgood.
Concerto for Violoncello.....	Mr. Charles Hermann.
Song, 'Ma mere était Bohémienne'.....	Servais.
Waltz, Illustrationen.....	Mrs. Charles Moulton.
Träumerei. [By request].....	Johann Strauss.
Hungarian March.....	Schumann.
	Schubert.

Mr. Osgood did well in giving for an encore, after the commonplace and sentimental song by Abt, one of the grandest and most poetic songs of Schubert: "Am Meer" (By the Sea), which he sang very finely. Mr. HEMMANN has a large, rich tone and great virtuosity on the violoncello; the Concerto, which he played, is an ambitious one, fully scored, but not very edifying. Mrs. MOULTON is in her element in such a song as Massé's "Ma mère," &c., and sang the half sentimental, half coquettish melody with a seductive subtlety. Schubert's Hungarian March, very much Liszt-ified, impressed by its Oriental and nomadic spirit, and the strong coloring of the instrumentation.

On Saturday afternoon the selections were these :

Overture. 'Der Schauspieldirector'.....Mozart.
Allegretto. 8th Symphony.....Beethoven.
Song. 'Lo, here the gentle Lark'.....Bishop.
Mrs. Charles Moulton.
Concerto. G minor op. 25.....Mendelssohn.
Miss Anna Mehlig.
Selections from the 'Flying Dutchman'.....Wagner-Tuscan Popular Melody.
'Saper l'origine vuol dell'amore'..Varisco.
'Will't know the origin of love?'
Mr. George L. Osgood.
Fantaisie. Solo for Harp.....Godofroid.
Mr. Adolphus Lockwood.
Air and Variations.....Proch.
Mrs. Charles Moulton.
Waltz. Rudolfs Klänge.....Joseph Strauss.
Rakoczy March.....Liszt.

The Overture to Mozart's early operetta: "The Theatre Director," is one of his very lightest, but it is Mozart, and therefore it is music,—genial, facile, charming, well worth a hearing for once, and more than once. This was a novelty, if quite an unpretending one, for which we can thank Mr. Thomas. The delightful "Clock" movement, the Allegretto from the eighth Symphony, is the one thing which, better than any thing else in his Symphonies, will bear to be given by itself. It was exquisitely rendered, although we did not feel that the fine orchestra was in its best mood for either of these two concerts: how can it always be so with such incessant journeying and concert-giving? The human organism, individual or collective, is quite as subject to atmospherical and other conditions as an organ or pianoforte. For Bishop's "Lark" song Mrs. Moulton substituted ("by request") one of the most beautiful of Gounod's tender and impassioned melodies: "O that we two were May-ing!", which was sung with delicacy and with feeling. It showed the sympathetic and expressive qualities of her voice to great advantage. "Robin Adair," most sweetly sung, was the welcome answer to a cordial encore. With what precision, fluency and charm she can use her voice like an instrument, as if it cost her no effort to warble difficult and florid passages, runs, arpeggios, trills, &c., &c., without end, was proved in the Air and Variations by Proch, in which she does not suffer much by comparison with Carlotta Patti or with Mme. Leutner. Miss Mehlig seemed fully herself in the performance of the Mendelssohn Concerto, and seldom have we heard it rendered so effectively both on the part of soloist and orchestra. Mr. Lockwood proved himself a very accomplished master of that now too rare instrument, the harp.

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG.—Fifth Gewandhaus Concert: "Michael Angelo Overture," Gade; Hymn from Pandora, B. Scholtz (Herr Gura); E flat major Concerto, Beethoven (Herr Urspruch); Duet from Der Fliegende Holländer, Herr R. Wagner (Mlle. Orgeni and Herr Gura); Symphony, No. 4, G minor, Raff; Organ Toccata, Bach-Tausig (Herr Urspruch); and Songs. Herr Ullmann has been obliged to leave without giving a concert as he intended. Speaking of this fact, the Berlin Echo remarks that Herr Ullmann has published his reasons in an advertisement, which does all honor to his bold and ready wit. In a few words he expresses the evils under which the Gewandhaus is suffering, evils which have reduced the Gewandhaus Concerts to below the level of those at any considerable town in the Rhenish provinces. [1] Herr Ullmann's manifesto runs as follows: "The fact of the alterations at the Central Hall being still incomplete was not the sole reason of my giving no concert in Leipzig. Though I could not have cleared my expenses at the Gewandhaus, the Directors demanded 200 thalers for the room, that is: four times as much as any concert-giver ever paid, or as I myself paid at the Patti Concerts; of course I would not submit to such extortion. The members of the committee are, without a doubt, estimable and honorable men, but they have one terrible fault; they cannot bear me. To what circumstances I owe this is something I do not know. I suppose it is because our principles are totally different. This is unfortunately [?] true. I endeavor to render my concerts as interesting as possible, while those of the Gewandhaus are generally monotonous and wearisome. Perhaps, too, the gentlemen are annoyed because more celebrated artists appear at a single one of my concerts than in the course of an entire Gewandhaus season. My fair singers, too, might somewhat damage the gentlemen's young vocal stars, who are still singing soffeggios. In one word: I am a man of progress; the Gentlemen of the Gewandhaus prefer following the old and beaten track. As they are so conservative, it is a wonderful thing that they are not better conservators of the reputation formerly enjoyed by these once so famous concerts. 'We do not haggle,' was the autocratic answer when my representatives offered 200 thalers."—London Mus. World.

The sixth concert was to be a celebration of the "golden wedding" of our good King John and his amiable consort the Queen Amelia of Saxony. The programme, prettily ornamented and colored in honor of the auspicious event, was headed with a chorus for male voices by Reinecke, a composition commencing with the words Salvum fac regem, breathing nothing but loyalty and love for our sovereign. This was followed by a prologue delivered by a lady, and then came the so-called "Sachsenlied," or "Song of the Saxons," the "God save the Queen" of England, which was sung in the approved English style, i. e., the first verse as a solo, the second with only half the strength of the chorus, and the third with full power of soloist, chorus and orchestra combined, an innovation which seemed to produce a very good effect. Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," or "Hymn of praise," a symphonic cantata with words from the Scriptures, occupied the second division of the programme. Mme. Peschka-Leutner, assisted by Mlle Gutzschbach and Herr Wowsorsky (a worn-out tenor from Berlin) sang the solo parts, the two former with great belcanto, the latter with a decidedly poor effect. The orchestral portions were, of course, given in the accustomed finished and careful style which has secured for the Gewandhaus orchestra an European celebrity. It is frequently too strong for the power of the chorus engaged, being very strong indeed in numbers.

The so-called "Chamber music soirées" have been recommenced with the customary good patronage of the public. The prospectus issued promises a considerable enjoyment to lovers of the old masters, whose quartets, quintets, sextets, &c., always form the staple items of the programmes. At the first soirée, given on the 26th Oct., Rensburg, David, Reincke, Hermann, and Hegar assisted, Schubert's quintet (Op. 163) for two violins, viola, and 2 cellos, being the pièce de résistance.—Standard.

DARMSTADT.—The members of the Grand-Ducal orchestra have begun their operations for the winter. The first concert promised well for what is to come. The programme included Beethoven's A major Symphony; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto; Beethoven's Romance in G major; and Schumann's "Abendlied," the last three compositions being exceedingly well played by Herr Hugo Heermann, from Frankfurt. Mlle. Erl sang several songs, among them being the grand air from Cherubini's Medea. The whole wound up with Schumann's overture to Manfred.

MUNICH.—First Subscription Concert of the Musical Society: Overture to Manfred, Schumann Air from Titus, Mozart (Mlle. M. J. Senheim); Pianoforte Concerto, with orchestra, Herr Hermann Scholtz (the composer); Song, Haydn, and Song, Beethoven (Mlle. Meysenheym); March for Orchestra, Grimm; Symphony, A major, Beethoven.—For some time, the practice of playing music between the acts, at the Royal Residenz-Theater, was abolished. It has, however, recently been revived, but on the old, careless, and slovenly model. Thus, during a performance, the other evening, of a version of the Spanish comedy, Lie für Lie, the interludes consisted of German waltzes. People ask, very naturally, whether it was impossible to find something more appropriate, say, a Spanish dance, or an old Saraband?—The bills of the Opera are almost exclusively monopolized by Herr R. Wagner. Competent and impartial judges say that, sooner than allow matters to go on in this way, the authorities would build a separate theatre for R. Wagner's works and engage separate artists; on the present plan, everything not already ruined cannot avoid being so ere long: the public taste, true singing, artists' voices, etc. Herr Wagner has already engrossed the plad-bills more than twelve times this season; compare to the composer of Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, Mozart is a stranger; his Don Giovanni is never heard; Die Zauberflöte has been played only once, and Le Nozze twice, in a long period. Beethoven, Rossini, Meyerbeer, and Auber, are just as scurvily treated. Herr Levy, the newly appointed conductor, from Carlsruhe, is exerting himself zealously to raise the orchestra at the Operahouse to its former efficient state, from which it has greatly deteriorated since the retirement of Herr Lachner.

BAYREUTH.—According to the Leipziger Tageblatt, Mme. Cosima, Liszt's daughter, and formerly the wife of Herr Hans von Bülow, the pianist, having gone over to the Protestant Church, was married to Herr R. Wagner during the recent visit here of her father, who was present at the ceremony.

VIENNA.—The first Subscription Concert for the season of the Society of the Friends of Music (Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde) took place on the 10th inst. Herr Johannes Brahms, who was greatly applauded on taking his position in the orchestra, officiated for the first time as artistic director. The programme was headed by Handel's Deliverance Te Deum. Then came two old vocal choruses, written by Heinrich Isaak and Eccard, and admirably sung by the Vocal Union. The next piece was Mozart's concert-air: "Ch'io mi scordi di te?" with obbligato piano and orchestra, Mme. Wilt being the singer. The concert wound up with Schubert's Pianoforte Duet in C major, Op. 140, scored for full band by Herr Joachim.—The second Musical Evening given by Herr von Bülow was devoted exclusively to Chopin. It was well attended.

LONDON.—The sixth Crystal Palace concert had the following programme:

- Overture "Festral" in C.....Wingham.
[First time of performance.]
Aria, "Vedrai Carino" (Don Giovanni).....Mozart.
Miss Fanny Heywood.
Madrigal, "In the spring time" (Pet Dove).....Gounod.
Mr. Vernon Rigby.
Pianoforte Concerto in B flat (his last).....Mozart.
[First appearance at these concerts.]
Mme. Arabella Goddard.
Spring Song, "Komm, Lieber Mai".....Mozart.
Miss Annie Heywood.
Symphony, "The Scotch".....Mendelssohn.
Aria, "Vedomi Intorno" (Idomeneo).....Mozart.
Mr. Vernon Rigby.
Arietta, "If a youth should meet a maiden".....Weber.
Miss Fanny Heywood.
Overture, "Leonora, No. 2".....Beethoven.

We are much pleased to point out to public admiration so promising a writer of the English school as Mr. T. Wingham, the signal success of whose new symphony at the Crystal Palace concert of March 23rd has more than once been referred to in these columns. We heard the "Festral Overture" when first produced, at the annual grand concert of the Royal Academy of Music, on Monday, the 22nd of July. We much admired it then; and that it improves upon acquaintance may be safely affirmed,—no insignificant fact as a test of merit. Mr. Wingham ranks as one of the distinguished pupils of the Royal Academy, and we expect him to take a high stand as one of our composers for "the future." The overture is bright and melodious, full of variety, and most ingeniously scored for the orchestra. If fault there be, we should mention (but gently) the ordinary one of diffusiveness, and a vacillation of tonality in the second theme. The details of the score will repay attentive examination. Mr. Manns of course did full justice to the work, which was vehemently applauded.

Mozart's last concerto is very variously placed in the catalogue raisonné. In Richault's edition it stands No. 15; whereas in the list of the Ritter Von Köchel it is numbered 595; and the first work of the year 1791, in which the composer died. The total number of his pianoforte concertos was 25. The one in B flat (a favorite key) is scored for the stringed quartet, one flute, two oboes, two bassoons, and two horns.

The concerto, as usual, includes three movements; and the style, frequently suggestive of Don Giovanni, is unmistakably Mozartean in all respects, the salient characteristics being an earnest tenderness relieved by an effusion of chastened cheerfulness; witness the largo and the deliciously played finale, the theme of which is repeated in the little German song (one of three) entitled "Komm, lieber Mai," sung by Miss Heywood to a pianoforte accompaniment. Mlle. Arabella Goddard interpreted the concerto à merveille, playing throughout with a delicacy and sympathy of spirit that moved the least susceptible temperament. The performance was a perfect feast to the connoisseur, and equivalent to a lecture on taste, not lost, we hope, on the youthful, and therefore still impressible, portion of the audience, now in a state of (pianoforte) frocks and knickerbockers.

The cadenzas of the concerto were specially written for Mme. Goddard, by Kapellmeister Reinecke, of Leipsic, the pianist at the first matinée of the Musical Union concerts this year. M. Reinecke, known to be a genuine and erudite musician, has religiously adhered to the spirit of his text, whilst allowing the accomplished artiste ample opportunity for the display of her brilliant executancy. It appears that Mozart himself wrote some cadenzas, but these are not found in all the editions.—Standard.

Here is the seventh programme;

- Overture, "Les Abencerages".....Cherubini.
Aria, "Dalla sua pace".....Mozart.
Symphony in G ("Letter V").....Haydn.
Recit. and air, "Far greater in his lowly state".....Gounod.
Pianoforte Concerto, No. 4, D minor.....Rubinstein.
Song "Once again".....Sullivan.
Air, "She wandered down".....F. Clay.
Overture, "Paradise and the Peri".....Sterndale Bennett.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Under the Silvery Stars. Song and Cho. 3.
E♭ to f. Hunley. 40
"Dark eyes were waiting for blue, Dimpled hands waited for brown."
A good little and pretty ballad.
I will not leave thee, dear one. 3. E♭ to e. Wand. 35
"My voice still calls thee fondly, Let love my faults atone."
Effective love song.
Over the Stars there is Rest. (Ueber den Sternen.)
4. D♭ to d. Abt. 30
The already very popular song arranged for alto voice.
The Flight of Time. 4. C to g. Meisinger. 30
"Faintly flow, thou falling river."
Well-known words, but entirely new and very pleasing melody.
The Cottage Door. 3. F to f. Smith. 30
"Then came the sun so mild,
And on the flowers smiled."
Very neat and pretty.
The Star that cheers our way. 3. F to g. Geary. 30
"Tis Hope, 'tis Hope, that blessed Star."
First-class ballad.
Just one kiss. 3. E to f. W. A. Smith. 35
"Just one word that was said through tears,
And told the story of all these years."
A Contralto Song, with major and minor passages. Melody generally simple, but the accompaniment more difficult.
Go West. Song and Dance. 2. B♭ to f. Maywood. 30
Comic, with a lively dance at the end.
My true Love has my Heart. 4. F to f. Blumenthal. 50
"By just exchange, one for another given."
A noble song, very beautiful in its elaboration, and dwelling frequently on the thought, "My true love has my heart, and I have his."

Instrumental.

- Lohengrin March. 4 hands. 3. G. Brieler. 35
Wagner's fresh and spirited music, easily arranged.
It is Done. Religious Meditation. 3. B minor. Poemanski. 30
The title simply suggests a thought which pervades this impressive and pleasingly mournful nocturne.
Real Estate. Polka Elegante. 4. D. Eikmeier. 40
A strange name, which may have been suggested by the fact that real estate is often "full of fire" as this certainly is, or that real estate is solid, and this is powerful and harmonious. In fact a first-class polka.
The Dream at Twilight. Waltz. 3. D. Cloy. 30
Very melodious, all of it. Difficult to point out a measure that has not some special beauty.
Trois Nocturnes. (No. 2). 4. E♭. Egghard. 35
Exceedingly graceful and pleasing.
New World Galop. (Eine Neuwelt). 3. D. E. Strauss. 35
Unmistakably Strauss-like and brilliant.
Dance of the Period, Leaders of the Dance, Tanz-Prioritäten. Waltzes. 3. Strauss. 60
A Set of Waltzes favored with three names, and being very brilliant, may be said to be worthy of all.
Bloom of Roses. Mazurka. 3. F. Fernald. 30
It was a delicate fancy that created this elegant Mazurka, and named it so appropriately.
Horace Greeley's Funeral March. 2. D minor. 40
Very impressive music. The last of the pieces with the lithograph of the great journalist, whose memory all now unite to honor.
Guard's Waltzes. Violin and Piano. 3. Godfrey. 75
Well-known favorites, newly arranged.
SILVER RIFLES. No. 6. Our Jennie's Choice. No. 7. Barefoot Polka. No. 11. Moments of Joy. No. 12. Mossy Rock Waltz. No. 13. Carnival March. No. 14. Little Fairies March. No. 15. Good Time March. No. 16. Love's Greeting Mazurka. M. C. 30
The "Rifles" are all excellent easy instructive pieces, and each contains a melody, as, for instance, No. 7 contains that of the so-called "Little Barefoot."

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Reminiscences of Mendelssohn.

BY HIS ENGLISH PUPIL.

This very happy time of my life could not last forever, so it was decided I should return to London and enter on the sea of troubles and vicissitudes connected with the active duties of professional life in England. The last week of my stay was devoted by Mendelssohn to all sorts of musical and social hospitalities. He arranged for a special private party at the Gewandhaus, where he gave us (my sister had arrived on a visit) a performance of the "Hymn of Praise" which we heard for the first time; and as an afterpiece Beethoven's Ninth Symphony with chorus. Every evening in the week was devoted to some species of music, and the last night before we left we had a musical party, at which Mendelssohn played Beethoven's Trio in C minor, and Mme. Schumann Mendelssohn's Trio in D minor. His sister, Mme. Hensel, was present, and played magnificently on this occasion. She had much of her brothers' fire and style, and was a most talented and intellectual person.

After this I returned to London, but frequently corresponded with Mendelssohn and passed many happy hours with him both in England and Berlin. Many memorable evenings were passed on these occasions; for, from 1843 to 1847, "The Walpurgisnacht," "Athalie," "Edipus," the music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," the Trio in C minor, many Quartets, and numerous smaller works, were produced in London, at the Philharmonic Society, at Exeter Hall, and in various private houses, especially at that of Moscheles, in Chester Place, Regent's Park, at my father's house, and at Mr. Alsager's, a most distinguished amateur, whose lamentable suicide greatly shocked his numerous friends. I was a member of the "Society of British Musicians," and on one occasion we invited Mendelssohn to be present at a performance of some of our own works. He came and listened most attentively, and, after our own share of the programme was concluded, he sat down to the piano and improvised in a most extraordinary manner, introducing many themes he had recollected from the music (all in manuscript) which he had heard.

In 1844 Mendelssohn sent to England Joseph Joachim, then a lad of 12 years old. The playing of this boy was astonishing, and it is well known to all that his extraordinary gifts have matured to an extent which now places him at the head of all violinists in the world. Great as Mendelssohn's pianoforte triumphs were, there was one occasion in which he excelled them all. A concert had been arranged at the Hanover Square Rooms, at which Thalberg, Moscheles, and Mendelssohn were announced to play Sebastian Bach's triple Concerto for three pianofortes, in D minor. As it was known to none better than himself, that Thalberg was not accustomed to extemporizing, it was agreed that no cadences should be made. The piece proceeded in a most satisfactory manner until the orchestra made a pause and, much to the surprise of those who knew the compromise, Moscheles commenced a cadence, and in his usual felicitous, musician-like and admirable manner, delighted the audience. Then came Thalberg, who, though completely taken by surprise, acquitted himself excellently well, albeit his style hardly assimilated with the ideas of the great Leipzig Cantor. During these two performances I watched Mendelssohn's countenance. At first when Moscheles began, he looked much annoyed, but he gradually accepted the situation, and bided his time. When Thalberg had finished, Mendelssohn waited for the long and deserved applause to subside. He then shrugged his shoulders and commenced. I wish I had the pen of a Dickens, or a Scott (had either of them had any knowledge of music) to describe in fitting terms this performance. It began very quietly, and the themes of the Concerto, most scientifically varied, gradually crept up in their new garments. A crescendo then began, the themes ever newly presented, rose higher and higher, and at last a storm, nay a perfect hurricane of octaves, which must have lasted for five minutes, brought to a conclusion an exhibition of mechanical skill, and the most perfect inspiration, which neither before nor since that memorable Thursday afternoon has ever been approached. The effect on the audience was electrical. At first perfect silence reigned, but as the cadence continued, symptoms of excitement were shown; when the rush of octaves commenced those present rose almost to a man, and with difficulty restrained bursts of applause; but when the end came rounds of cheers were given for the great artist, which sounded like salons of artillery. I walked with Mendelssohn in Hyde Park after this triumph, and on congratulating him he replied: "I thought the people would like some octaves, so I played them."

Very many pages might be filled with descriptions of occurrences similar to the above, but one must be sufficient, as both time and space are closing in. The last season Mendelssohn spent in England before the production of "Elijah" was perhaps the most brilliant of all. He was everywhere received with the utmost enthusiasm. The Queen and Prince Albert paid him the most marked attentions, and every one from the highest to the lowest vied in showing honor to the great genius and thoroughly excellent man. But all this adulation, however justly deserved, had little or no effect upon his simple and modest character. His motto seems throughout life to have been "Excelsior," and, one art triumph reached, completed, another and a still higher flight of genius was immediately contemplated. Although the first families in England eagerly sought his society, and although he not unfrequently paid them visits, yet his heart was always with his own relatives and his old friends. On one occasion, when staying with Madame Mendelssohn's aunt at Denmark Hill near London, an excursion to Windsor was planned; he pleaded a slight indisposition and did not join the party. It would seem that he employed the day after his own way, for when his friends returned he delighted them in the evening by playing the result of his labors, the charming "Lied ohne Worte," in A major, No. 6 of the 5th Book, in the first London Edition,—one of the freshest, most pleasing, and universally popular of the whole collection.

It has often been a reproach to the English nation that not only did it consist of "shopkeepers," but that it had not any taste or love for music. Such an assertion is easy to make, and almost as easy to disprove, but a refutation of so absurd a declaration is by no means the object of this paper. Granting for the sake of argument, that England has produced no composer whose works can be measured with those of the mighty Germans of the last and present century, England, of all nations in Europe, has stood preëminent in her patronage, production, and performance of these great works. It was England's appreciation and England's wealth, that first encouraged Handel to strike out that path of Sacred Music which enabled him to die a rich man, and by his works render himself immortal. It is English taste, and England's money that has made her annual and triennial musical Festivals at Gloucester, Hereford, Worcester, Norwich, and above all at Birmingham, not only a source of enormous income, most nobly spent in the relief of sickness and distress, (in London alone the "Messiah" has realized more than $1000,000 for the cause of charity), but these Festivals have greatly benefitted the artists engaged, and have largely added to the improvement of musical taste, by the production of all schools of art, performed in an irreproachable manner. At the head of these great musical gatherings, the triennial music meeting at Birmingham stands before all. Every third year this great "tone feast" is held in the city of steam engines and manufactories. So arduous are the preparations, that at the conclusion of one Festival hardly six months elapse before arrangements are commenced for the next, two years and a half distant. I have not at hand the means of ascertaining the precise date of the first of these great events, but I think I am not in error in stating that the commencement of them on something approaching the present grand scale, was in 1832, when the noble Town Hall in Birmingham was inaugurated, and the new organ, then one of the wonders of the world, (but now greatly exceeded by larger and better instruments in England and America), was heard for the first time. On this occasion a new Oratorio, "David," by Neukomm was produced. The only part of this work I recollect was a curious effect of "sound-painting," namely a tremendous chromatic scale with a bang of the big drum at the end of it. This scale was intended to represent the stone leaving David's sling, and the bang was the said stone hitting Goliath's forehead!! This festival, imperfect as it was compared with its successors, gave Birmingham the lead in all similar undertakings, and no meetings were held without some new work by a great composer being expressly ordered by the committee. For some years the Direction was anxious to enlist Mendelssohn into its service, but his many engagements in his own country prevented his fulfilling the wish. In 1840 and again in 1843, the "Hymn of Praise," "St. Paul," and various other lesser works had been given under the composer's direction, and received with enthusiastic fervor; but in 1843 the committee obtained a positive promise that not only should a work be ready for the Festival of 1846, but that Mendelssohn would himself direct the music. Beyond the promise given, the selection of the work itself, whether choral or instrumental, sacred or secular, was left to Mendelssohn's discretion; but I rather think strong hints were thrown out, that an Oratorio would be the most acceptable work that could be written in fulfillment of the engagement. It is unnecessary now to say more than that "Elijah" was the work written. All the circumstances of its composition, the difficulties of the libretto, and the extraordinary triumph of its production on the memorable 31st of August, 1846, in the Birmingham Town Hall, are so amply, clearly, and beautifully detailed in Mendelssohn's letters of the period, that any attempt at redescribing in detail the events of that remarkable festival would fall farshort of the magnificence of the reality, which, as it was willed by Providence, was the last blaze of glory in a life which all hoped and then believed was destined to a long period of greater success.

"Elijah" has passed into a realm far beyond the reach of criticism. In popularity it vies with the "Messiah" and "Creation." As a masterpiece of genius and musical craft, in its faultless construction, its wonderful delineation of the character of the great Prophet and his contemporaries, in the gorgeousness of its instrumental clothing, in its various touching episodes, and in its masterly contrapuntal treatment, although there is not a set Fugue in it for the delectation of ultra Handelians, the production of "Elijah" is the great event of Oratorio writing since "Israel in Egypt." There is only one work which can be named in comparison to it, viz., "St. Paul." While the latter in many ways may be and is considered the superior work by reason of its undoubtedly greater contrapuntal learning, yet I cannot wonder at "Elijah" being the greatest favorite; and this arises, if I may say so, from a very obvious cause. In "St. Paul" Mendelssohn had to give to his music a stern, uncompromising early Christian coloring; excepting in the raving of the indignant Jews, against the taunts of Stephen and the outpourings of Paul, there was no opportunity for any great dramatic treatment. The reverse is the case in Elijah. Were it to English habits seemly, the whole oratorio without any material alteration might be placed on the stage with the greatest propriety, with scenery, costume and dramatic action. There is not a scene in the work which is not capable of the highest stage effect, and I fancy that, had Mendelssohn lived, something approaching to a dramatic performance would have been attempted; an undertaking similar to those described by him in his letters from Düsseldorf, where "Israel in Egypt" was performed with scenery and action. Such an exhibition of sacred subjects is however quite contrary to English feeling, and an attempt at introducing it would inevitably be forbidden by the law, but the real dramatic tendency of "Elijah" will always remain the chief secret of its great popularity.

I have said that "Elijah" was the culminating triumph of Mendelssohn's genius. He received the universal homage of multitudes with the calmness and absence of vanity which was the chief characteristic of his mind. I saw him at the house of his old friend Mr. Moore an hour after the first performance at Birmingham. All he replied to my hearty congratulations was: "I know you like some of 'Elijah,' tell me what you do not like," and no sooner had he returned to his beloved Leipzig for the Gewandhaus Concerts of 1846, than he set to work to make sundry alterations and improvements; the greatest of which was, perhaps, the substitution of the unaccompanied trio for Soprani: "Lift thine eyes" for an accompanied Duet to the same words. During this autumn and winter his letters show that not only was he employed in preparing "Elijah" for the press, but he was sketching out various plans for future works, amongst others the "Christus," thereby showing his wish to add another to the numerous works on the same subject, which more than any other has engaged the minds of all great composers.

The London season of 1847 now drew near, and it was known that its principal honors would be given to Mendelssohn and the "Elijah." Many performances were held in the provinces and in Dublin, at most of which he presided; and at Exeter Hall his new Oratorio, and his appearance was the signal for crowded audiences and enthusiastic receptions. During this time in London he was excessively occupied with all sorts of public and private engagements,—but he never forgot his old friends. He lived chiefly at the house of his friend, Charles Klingemann, in Hobart Place, Eaton Square, and many were the delightful evenings spent in that most agreeable circle. His last appearance in London was at a Philharmonic concert in July, at the Hanover Square Rooms. Few present on that occasion will forget the evening. Both the Queen and the Prince Consort were present. Mendelssohn played Beethoven's Concerto in G, and directed his own Midsummer Night's Dream music. Two days after this he left England for the last time. It has been asserted by an author writing on "Music and Morals," that "Elijah" destroyed Mendelssohn. This is not the fact. It is true that at the close of the London season he was excessively tired by the constant ovations offered him; but there is no reason to suppose that, if he could have had the quiet and repose in Switzerland he had planned for himself and family, he would not have recovered his usual health. All was prepared for a happy holiday in the Bernese Oberland, which he always declared was the most beautiful country he knew; the sketch books and color boxes were packed, the last proofs of "Elijah" had been corrected and sent to the press; plans were formed for the continuation of "Christus" and many other works lying unfinished in his portfolio; everything pointed to a happy period of some weeks of perfect quiet with his wife and children, when an event occurred which laid the foundation of his fatal illness. Mendelssohn had been most fondly attached to all the members of his family, but especially to his sister Fanny Hensel. This lady, as I have already stated, was gifted with the highest musical attainments; she was an admirable pianist and an excellent composer, and she has left many works which show she possessed much of her brother's genius. Nothing can show the love which the brother and sister entertained for each other better than Mendelssohn's own letters.

It was either on the day fixed for Mendelssohn's leaving Frankfurt-on-the-Main, or close upon it, that Mme. Hensel died suddenly in Berlin. The painful news was communicated to Mendelssohn in a very abrupt manner, and the effect was such as to completely stun him, and to cause a slight attack of the malady which afterwards in so short a time proved fatal. However he was still urged by his friends and physicians to carry out his plans for change of scene and repose, and he did so. His letters during this closing period of his life are very sad. In one to his friend Buxton, of the firm of Ewer & Co., the London publishers of his works, he speaks in a gloomy manner of returning to Leipzig "to set his house in order," and it is evident that the great grief caused by his sister's decease had the effect upon his mind and body which subsequently caused his death. In the fall of the year, he returned with his family to Leipzig, and commenced preparations for the musical season, and especially for a grand performance of "Elijah" at Vienna, which he was especially engaged to conduct. Soon after he arrived in Leipzig, it became necessary for him to go to Berlin, in order to arrange his late sister's musical MSS. and other papers which had been left in his charge. This was the last drop which caused the cup to overflow. His early life in Berlin, his never ceasing affection for his mother, who died in 1844, and for his sister so recently taken from him, was all brought back to him. On his return to Leipzig he became frequently subject to fits of unconsciousness, and on the very day that he was to have conducted a Gewandhaus concert, and a week before the time fixed for his journey to Vienna, he fell into a stupor from which he never recovered, and died calmly and painlessly on the 4th of November, 1847.

The cause of his death was ascertained by a post mortem examination to be an affection of the brain. The year following his death I was in Leipzig, and I saw the physician who attended him. He told me that had it been possible to save his life his reason would probably have been so affected, that melancholy madness would have been the result. It is needless to add that death was a preferable alternative to such a life of misery for such a mind.

News in 1847 did not travel so fast as now, but such an occurrence was not long in reaching London, the scene of Mendelssohn's many triumphs and successes. The unexpected event, and the necessary confusion and excitement in Leipzig rendered it impossible for private letters to be written. The first intelligence therefore came through the public prints, and I became acquainted with the fact by reading the Times newspaper of the 7th of November, 1847. It was aptly said by Mr. Chorley in the Athenæum, that since the death of Scott no event had made such an impression as the death of Mendelssohn. Scott, however, died at a mature age, and after such a wonderful exercise of his powers as might well try the mind of any man over sixty years of age. Mendelssohn died in the thirty-seventh year of his age. A few months previously he had quitted London in the full possession of all his faculties. He had left under many promises to return; plans were made for the production of new works; new triumphs were in store for him; and England, next to Germany the home of his choice, was already girding herself up for the dispensing of further honors and proofs of love. No wonder then that the 4th of November was a black letter day in the history of music in Great Britain.

A few weeks after Mendelssohn's death, means were taken for the erection of a suitable monument to his memory. A Committee of professors was appointed, with Sir George Smart as the Chairman, and consisting mostly of Mendelssohn's English musical friends and pupils. Benedict, Bennett, Cipriani Potter, Henry Smart, myself, H. F. Chorley, E. Buxton, and some others whose names at this distance of time have escaped my memory, were appointed members of this Committee. Our first object was to raise the necessary funds. After much discussion it was resolved that a performance of "Elijah" should be given at Exeter Hall. This was done at the commencement of 1848, and a splendid interpretation of our friend's last work took place under Benedict's direction, Jenny Lind volunteering to take the principal soprano part. This concert realized a large sum after paying very heavy expenses, and then arose the question as to the best mode of raising a monument and the form it should assume. Various discussions took place; the respective merits of marble statues in Hanover Square and other ways of personally perpetuating Mendelssohn's memory were debated; but yet nothing was definitely decided, as we all felt that neither marble nor bronze could sufficiently perpetuate the memory of our dear friend, and to many of us, master. At last a happy idea occurred. One of Mendelssohn's last acts in musical politics was the foundation of a music school in Leipzig. At this institution the most complete art education is imparted to the students. Every branch of executive instruction is taught by the first professors who can be obtained, and after a prescribed course of study, diplomas and degrees are conferred which are sure vouchers for the efficiency of those who hold them. The Committee, then, of the Mendelssohn memorial concert came, I think, to a wise conclusion when they decided to invest the funds at their disposal in the English Funds, in the name of Trustees, who were to apply the interest to the maintaining "forever" a "Mendelssohn scholar," a native of the British Empire, at the Music School in Leipzig. This was done, and the result has given much greater satisfaction than any expenditure of this money on marble or metal statuary. The first Mendelssohn scholar was Mr. A. S. Sullivan, now well known in England as a very talented composer. The present holder of the scholarship is Mr. William Shakespeare; and if the holder of it proves only as good a musician as his namesake was a poet and dramatist, England has great things to hope from the result of his studies.

"Si monumentum requiris, circumspice." This most pertinent but perhaps too oft quoted phrase from the inscription to Sir Christopher Wren, in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, London, most fittingly applies to Mendelssohn. His works are his monument, and most truly will they follow him. These I leave to the admiration of all who would learn what is good and great in music. If he had not the learning of Bach, the massiveness of Handel, the versatility of Mozart, the grandeur of Beethoven, was not his style, his very mannerism, a happy combination, in addition to his own exhaustless invention, of all the great men, his compeers who had preceded him? Where shall we find better and more satisfactory evidences of learning than in "St. Paul," "Elijah," the many Psalms and the Church music written for the Cathedral in Berlin? Where shall we find in modern composition greater massiveness than in the Chorus: "Arise, shine," in St. Paul, or in "Thanks be to God" or "Be not afraid" in Elijah? Where can greater versatility be discovered than in the writings of a man whose mind could range from the composition of the "Antigone" and "Oedipus" choruses, the Italian and Scotch Symphonies, down to the wonderfully serio-comic funeral march of "Pyramus and Thisbe" in the "Midsummer Night's Dream"? And in grandeur or fancy can many better specimens of both be found than in the Druid's choruses in the "Walpurgisnacht" or in the pseudo Witches' chorus in the same work? The fact is, that the more Mendelssohn's works are studied the more will they be believed in, and far from waning, I feel certain that long after many stars have set that now are shining, Mendelssohn's fame, as a planet fixed in the admiration of true believers in all that is sterling and great in art, will remain in its proper hemisphere, to be the wonder and instructor of all ages.

Of my dear friend's character as a man it is difficult to speak but in terms that might almost savor of exaggeration. In all relations of life, as a son, a husband and a father, he was humanly speaking perfect. I never met with a man who came up more to the standard of a Christian, a scholar and a gentleman. In his art opinions he was essentially catholic, and sought for good in all schools. His great models were Bach and Beethoven, but he was at all times willing to admit talent wherever he found it. Thus he rescued Schubert from the undeserved neglect, if not total ignorance, into which his works had fallen. He was the fast friend of Robert Schumann, who during his life time was living in Leipzig, and greatly indebted to Mendelssohn for artistic advice and friendly counsel. The "Music of the Future" had, at Mendelssohn's death, not permeated musical society to the extent that it has since obtained; but I have heard him speak of Wagner's early works with great respect and hopes for the future, and although I cannot for a moment believe that he, as so consummate an artist, would have been pleased with all he heard from the disciples of the "Musik der Zukunft," yet I feel sure he would have done justice to the splendid orchestration, and the great strivings and yearnings of the school to strike out new paths of art, and would have gladly recognized the immense talent required to do this, as worthy of all praise.

Thus, I have endeavored to record my imperfect tribute of love and admiration to the memory of a man who was certainly the greatest musician of his time. As I said at the outset of my remarks, I trust the interest of the subject will be the excuse for all the faults with which I have executed my task. In America, Mendelssohn has long been the object of the greatest homage. This, the country destined to the greatest future yet attained by any nation of the earth, does well to cherish the memory of the great men of Europe; and amongst them all, whether as an artist, or as a man, few will be found worthier of admiration than Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

Form in Music.

II.

We cannot confine our remarks to the inexperienced herd who, as we said before, rush into print without one quarter of the requisite knowledge. We feel it our duty to offer advice to two classes of composers who may be fairly assumed to have studied form, in a more or less perfect degree. The first has succeeded in mastering the principles of one particular form, and at once proceeds to write it to death. It thus becomes like a cobbler's last: he can turn out any number of pieces on the one block, and consequently his works have a stereotyped mannerism from which they can never be dissociated. We know Mr. Smallbrain. He is a "popular composer." He deluges our music warehouses with legions of pianoforte pieces, and produces the morceaux brillants, fantasies elegantes, nocturnes, bagatelles, and caprices de salon in infinite quantities. In every one of these we at once recognize "the block;" and, as to the difference between all these elegant terms, we are of the opinion of the immortal Sam Weller that "it is the seasoning as does it;" knowing, as we do, that the title constitutes the only difference between the caprice and the fantasia, and that they are all formed upon the simplest "block;" the composer being perhaps ignorant of the fact. Mr. Smallbrain must feel that, when once the public shall have become nauseated with his parvum in multo, he will speedily be consigned to oblivion. His fathers and grandfathers tried the same thing, and where are they now?

The other class is represented by men of acknowledged eminence and position, whose works are real music, and prove that their authors are acquainted with the principles and details of form. But we accuse them of frequent misapplication of nomenclature. In music recently under our perusal, we have a capriccio, which is simply a lied, with no caprice about it—a rondo, which never comes round to its subject, and is therefore not a rondo—a potpourri on one operatic air—and a sonatina, which really is a caprice; there being nothing amplified, developed, or even repeated about it. If composers who really do direct and influence public taste would be more discriminative in the terms they use, they would do more for art than they even now achieve.

We conclude these remarks by advising students to carefully read the valuable articles on "Artistic Forms" in Dr. Marx's book, and direct attention to the classic masters, as compared with each other in their adherence to, or departure from, the principles of form. And first, our mind naturally reverts to Haydn, as the establisher and developer of musical form of the symphonic class. We do not say that those principles did not exist in the works of Bach and Corelli; but affirm that it is to Haydn we must look for the first perfect symmetry of detail. Gluck and Mozart were punctilious in their regard to form in everything they wrote; while Beethoven may be regarded as the "master of form" and a model, without the study of whom any musician's labors must be incomplete. In examining the foregoing authors, it is remarkable that their ideas were few in quantity, but rich in quality:—that their subject matter is pregnant and fertile:—and that the great charm of their writing is the skill with which they developed that subject matter. Weber, on the contrary, was too impulsive to confine himself to the rules of form. He produced powerful and beautiful phrases in rapid succession, but rarely with anything like reproduction or development. Consequently, in any given amount of musical matter, Weber would use six separate ideas to Beethoven's one: the result being that none of Weber's leave any lasting impression on the mind, while that of Beethoven's would be ineffaceable. Take the beautiful phrase in the movement known as "Softly sighs." Where, we ask, is the completion of the air? (we refer of course to the quick movement near the end); and does it not leave in the mind a sense of inconclusiveness and consequent imperfection? Weber's music is like the ever-changing beauty of the kaleidoscope: Beethoven's like the symmetry and wondrously minute perfection of an oriental inlaying. Mendelssohn, in this matter, is chiefly remarkable for his development of the lied form, and for his daring, occasionally, to depart from prescribed rule; but with all his beauty and power, he is a dangerous model, as regards form, for the student. Meyerbeer seems the most successful modern composer who has, in some sense, repudiated musical form: it requires, however, genius such as his to do this and succeed. Of Wagner we will offer no opinion here, because his works have had, as yet, no fair chance in this country. He meets us boldly in denying the abstract right of musical form. He evidently thinks the world mad, and the world thinks him mad. Which opinion will be substantiated, time must prove.—London Mus. Standard

GOUNOD, the eminent French composer, has gone to law. A man does not betake himself to the protection of an English Court of Chancery, it may well be believed, until his wrongs have become so outrageous that he is nearly driven to madness by them. And this seems to have been the case with the composer of "Faust." He had gathered together about sixty compositions, all set to English words, and all having his own name upon the title page. He played these over, not in the fond spirit with which artists are wont to regard their own productions, but with a perfect crescendo of rage. "It is a wise child," says the old proverb, "that knows its own father." In this case it would have taken a wiser man than Solomon to recognize his own children. Poor Gounod's babes had been, so to speak, dressed up in the most fantastic garments. Their eyebrows had been corked, their heads shaved, their cheeks painted, and false whiskers applied to their callow cheeks. What wonder that the unhappy parent failed to recognize his bantlings! To speak according to the fact, the enterprising English publishers had ransacked M. Gounod's compositions and selected from them such melodies as they thought would serve their turn. Then they altered the accompaniment and varied the tune according to their own notions of fitness, and finally set the music to words entirely different in spirit to those for which they were composed. Gounod found his requiems doing duty as love songs, and melodies through which he had sought to express the depths of despair hurried up in the time and set for quadrille music. Under such circumstances an author might contemplate either suicide or chancery, or perhaps first chancery and then suicide. Happily the appeal to the law has not been in vain, and Vice-Chancellor Malins—the blessings of the nine muses be upon him—has granted a perpetual injunction against the well-known firms of Cramer, Wood & Co. and Hutchins & Romer, restraining them from publishing further songs with M. Gounod's name attached. Now if the composer would but turn his attention to some of our American publishers it would be a boon to the public, for the same system of distortion has been carried on here, and, in fact, has been carried so far as greatly to injure Gounod's reputation, and to make his so-called songs things to be avoided rather than sought for.—N. Y. Sun.

The Church Music Association.

[The New York Tribune, Dec. 28, has the following notice of the first concert of this Association under its new conductor, Mr. HORSLEY, one of the most accomplished of English musicians, a pupil and intimate associate of Mendelssohn,—witness his interesting "Reminiscences" contributed to the last three numbers of this Journal.]

The little handful of brave people who faced the storm on Thursday night for the purpose of attending the first concert of the fourth season of the Church Music Association at Steinway Hall, were rewarded with a much better performance than they had any right under the circumstances to expect. The chorus, to be sure, was small, the altos numbering only seven or eight, and the sopranos only about half their usual number, and we should say that the people on the stage, including the orchestra, were just about as many as the people in the body of the hall. Still the singing was more correct and more spirited than it usually has been at the entertainments of this society, and the programme was excellent. The first piece was Sir William Sterndale Bennett's "Najaden" overture, a most graceful and ingenious work, charmingly conceived and beautifully scored. Haydn's Third, or Imperial, Mass, which the Church Music Association has given once before, was repeated with considerable effect; and the concert closed with Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night," of the execution of which we can say that, though open to criticism, it showed intelligent and appreciative study. The difficult chorus, "Come with Torches," was rather too much for the singers, but the beautiful and characteristic "Disperse, disperse, ye gallant men" won an encore. The solo parts in the Mass and the "Walpurgis Night" were taken by Mrs. Gulager, Miss Antonia Henne, Mr. Leggat, and Mr. Remmert.

The Church Music Association has secured for its Musical Director and Conductor Mr. Charles Edward Horsley, an English musician and composer of reputation, and son of the late William Horsley, the distinguished glee writer. Under the charge of this leader we shall expect the Association to do much better things than it has hitherto seemed to be in the way of accomplishing. Of course Mr. Horsley's capacity is not to be gauged by the result of his first concert, especially a concert given with less than half his chorus; but good judges are already impressed in his favor. There was a remark of his on the programme, which is so just, and so entirely in accord with what we have several times written, apropos of certain performances in New York, that we shall venture to reprint it:

"This Mass has already been performed by the members of the Church Music Association, so any more detailed account of it is unnecessary. It is, however, played this evening as Haydn wrote it, and without the additional instruments which were added on a former occasion. It is a great question with the present Musical Director as to how far such additions are justifiable. In the case of Handel, to whose "Messiah," "Alexander's Feast," and "Acis and Galatea," additional wind parts have been added by Mozart and Mendelssohn, the reason is obvious. The orchestras of Handel's time contained comparatively few wind instruments, and it is well known that he himself, by his masterly accompaniments on the organ, supplied the deficiency. After his death the tradition was lost, and these additions were completely justified, and in the hands of such masters as Mozart and Mendelssohn, Handel's ideas benefited rather than lost by the process. In Haydn's case, the matter becomes totally altered. In his time all the instruments now in vogue were known and, when he desired it, used by him. Haydn was the father of modern instrumentation. Mozart, Beethoven, and all his other great cotemporaries, were indebted to his symphonies and other works for their knowledge and power to carry out what he had so nobly invented, and it is absurd to suppose that, having all the musical resources of the Austrian capital at his command, he would not have employed a second flute, two clarionets, two horns, and three trombones in this "Imperial Mass," had he conceived that his music required them. Such additions are totally superfluous, and, in the Music Director's opinion, savor of such a want of reverence for the memory of a truly great man and artist, that they should at once be put aside, as in every respect to be avoided."

[From the Sun.]

It has always been the fortune of this society to have its chorus seats full and an audience that crowded the hall to the doors, and this was the first exception to the rule. It was the night of the great storm—a true Walpurgis night. Mendelssohn's cantata of that name was to be performed, but evidently the subscribers were not anxious to go through an actual "Walpurgis Night" for the sake of an unreal one. The consequence was that the audience on one side and the chorus and orchestra on the other about balanced each other in numbers, and the empty benches mustered in stronger force than either.

Perhaps this was not after all so much a matter of regret, since those who came were undoubtedly the most earnest and enthusiastic part of the chorus. Certainly the result was a very satisfactory one, for we never heard the association sing with so much unity, precision, correctness, and spirit, as on this occasion. Those who are accustomed to assert that a chorus of amateurs cannot sing were refuted by the facts of that evening's performance, and certainly a part of the credit due for this belongs to the late leader of the society, Mr. Pech. We have never thought that he had the wisest of ways as a conductor; nevertheless, in listening to the admirable singing of the present chorus, we could not fail to trace its efficiency in great part to the zeal and persistency with which he has drilled it for the last three years.

Mr. Horsley, the new leader, has a name that for more than one generation has been an honored one in the musical literature of England, and one which no lover of English glee and madrigal music can hear without respect. He comes to us, therefore, with good antecedents and an excellent musical reputation.

In person Mr. Horsley is a large and powerful man, well advanced in life, not graceful in action, but of a hearty manner and genial temper, and with a firm method that gives him an easy control over his instrumental and vocal forces.

The pieces performed were Haydn's Third Mass—known as the "Imperial Mass"—and Mendelssohn's music to Goethe's "First Walpurgis Night." The soloists were Mrs. Gulager, Miss Henne, Mr. Leggat, and Mr. Remmert, of whom, and we speak it with due respect for the marked abilities of the other singers, Mr. Remmert was by far the best. His singing, indeed, of the music of the Druid priest in the "Walpurgis Night," a part written by Mendelssohn for his cherished friend, Edward Devrient, was really superb, and would anywhere, even at such a Gewandhaus concert as that at which the work was first produced, have commanded admiration.

We congratulate the association on its new conductor and on the evident progress that it is making, which was very manifest in the correctness with which the fugue on the words "In Gloria Dei Patri," in the mass, was given, and also in the finish and precision with which the very difficult final choruses of the "Walpurgis Night" were sung.

The efforts of the altos were especially to be commended. They were numerically by far the weakest part of the chorus, there being not more than eight of them as against some forty or more sopranos, but they sang with a promptness and assurance that very nearly made good the inequality in numbers.

There was a time when the Church Music Association was afraid of its music, and attacked a chorus with the suppressed murmur of an army of mosquitoes, but that day is happily over. The society has learned to open its mouth, if we may use the expression, and that is half of the art of singing, and now there will be no more bocca chiusa humming. Now let them look with a little more attention to the expression marks and all will be well. There were passages in the mass that should have shaded down with a fine diminuendo that were held out forte to the end, and generally speaking the chorus has not yet learned the full value of a pianissimo.

Musical Correspondence.

Music in New York.—Thomas's Second Symphony Concert.—Rubinstein.

NEW YORK, JAN. 6, 1873.—The second of six Symphony Soirées by Theodore Thomas, at Steinway Hall, came on Saturday evening, Dec. 28. The audience comprised all of our best listeners, for the press was fully represented, and there are few musicians of note among us whose faces were not to be discerned when the brilliant sun-burners threw a sudden radiance over the assembly, and Thomas raised his bâton to begin the Symphony.

It was the sixth by Beethoven,—The "Pastorale." The opening Allegro ma non troppo was wonderfully well played. I cannot describe the lightness, the delicacy, the precision of the strings; and the wind instruments were beyond praise, being in perfect tune and kept well under in their proper place.

The second movement, Andante molto moto, is the most popular part of the work, on account of the beautiful flow of melody which is generally supposed to represent a book. It is, however, to my mind, inferior to the final Allegretto; and the introduction of the "Cuckoo," at the close of the movement, is a trick not in keeping with the general spirit of Beethoven's works.

The third movement, Scherzo, comes fairly under the head of programme music, called "descriptive" because an attempt is made to describe material things, whereas the true province of music is to describe ideas and emotions. All that we can say of the "merry-making of peasants interrupted by a thunderstorm," is that the representation is as good as can be made in music. The Allegretto which follows this Scherzo without break, is, to me, the most delightful part of the Symphony. The Shepherds' song is genuine inspiration. The theme itself is inconceivably lovely and it passes through variation after variation, each of which seems more beautiful than that which precedes it. It is hard to find words sufficient to praise the manner in which this work was performed by Mr. Thomas' admirable orchestra. It was simply perfect, for the most exacting critic could find no flaw or blemish.

The next piece was Max Bruch's Violin Concerto, op. 26, which was played by Sarasate at one of our Philharmonic concerts last season. This time the violinist was Mr. S. E. Jacobsohn, a newly acquired member of the Thomas Orchestra, who displayed considerable talent in the way of rapid, facile execution. His tone is good, although not strong, and his rendering of the piece would have been very good were it not for a tendency to flat, which, however, may have been caused by nervousness. The last movement of the Concerto is particularly fine, but it demands a breadth of technique and a vigorous, open style which few violinists possess.

Berlioz's Overture, "King Lear," closed the first part of the programme. Part Second was composed entirely of "future music," beginning with Liszt's Symphonic Poem "Die Hunnenschlacht," which is supposed to describe Kaulbach's painting of that name. The final triumph of the Christians is denoted by a choral, which is first outlined by the brass and afterwards taken up by the organ, [which, by the way, was a quarter of a tone below the orchestra.] This choral is worked up between the organ and the orchestra with magnificent effect. Mr. Caryl Florio was the organist.

The remaining selections were Wagner's fine Introduction and Finale from "Tristan and Isolde," already familiar to most of us through the Garden Concerts, and the weird "Ritt der Walküren" from Die Walküre.

The third Symphony Soirée will take place on

Jan. 11th, when Anton Rubinstein will play Beethoven's Concerto in G. The combination of Theodore Thomas's well drilled orchestra with the Rubinstein concert troupe, less the feminine element of the latter, gives our musical connoisseurs a rare opportunity of hearing the finest concerted pieces of the best masters rendered in a style of faultless excellence. Three of these entertainments have been given at Steinway Hall. The programme of the first was as follows :

Overture. "The Water-Carrier".....Cherubini.
Concerto. No. 3, G major.....Rubinstein.
Anton Rubinstein.

Concerto for Violin.....Beethoven.
H. Wieniawski.
[first movement].

Symphonic Poem: "Tasso"..... Liszt.
Kreislerrana..... Schumann.
Anton Rubinsatn.

Adagio for Violin.....Rubinstein.
Polonaise ".....Wieniawski.
H. Wieniawski.

Ballade, } Chopin.
Scherzo, }
Nocturne, }

Huldigungs March.....Wagner.

Rubinstein gains upon us steadily, and we are deeply indebted to Mr. Grau for the enterprise he has shown in presenting to us an artist whose immense power and grandeur, together with his delicacy of touch and thoroughly musical sentiment, show him to be the most complete pianist who has ever visited our shores. Rubinstein has no meretricious tricks for display, or special gymnastic feats for the wonder of open-eyed and gaping provincials; but he plays as though he had no ideas except the musical one which he endeavors to express. He is, of course, an unequal performer;—what artist of real genius is not? In the Ballade by Chopin (Op. 23, in G min.) he slurred and blurred to complete indistinctness the Finale, which needs the utmost clearness to mean anything to most ears; and in several instances he simplified the broken double-note passages by making single octaves of them. This was easier for him, no doubt, but it was hardly satisfactory to those who have studied the Ballade until every note is perfectly familiar. In Schumann's "Kreisleriana," however, his accuracy was unfailing, and he performed the whole of that magnificent piece, or set of pieces, in a style which certainly could not be surpassed by any artist in the world. In the Chopin Scherzo (op. 20, B min.) his tempo was too rapid to give the ordinary amateur any sort of an understanding of the composer's intention; and in playing the lovely Nocturne (op. 27, No. 2, in D flat), he displayed all that exquisite delicacy and neatness of fingering, all that tender grace of expression which are so peculiarly necessary to any one who attempts to interpret the gifted Pole; and it is only just to say that human fingers could not give a more positive rendering of that delicious, dreamy Nocturne. Some years ago I heard Rubinstein play this same composition at a classical concert in London, and it was the prevailing impression then that the author himself had scarcely played it better.

As for Wieniawski,—well, there are violinists and violinists. Some people like a clear, pure tone ; others, apparently, do not. Those who admire scratching and false stopping, together with sundry other things of the same nature would have experienced wild joy upon hearing Beethoven's Violin Concerto as it was played on the evening in question ; but, for those who regard a correct intonation as a thing of primal importance, it could not have been pleasing.[!] Wieniawski, evidently belongs to that school, of which Ole Bull is a prominent member, whose first article of belief is that genuine passion and fervor is signified by rasping the strings. In the days of Corelli roughness of tone may have been unavoidable, but, with the violin-bow as constructed at present, it is a glaring fault in any player.

If my language seems severe, it should be remembered that, while Wieniawski's merits have been fully acknowledged and discussed, since his appearance in America, no critic has yet, as far as I am aware, ventured to express what can hardly fail to be the sentiments of a musician with regard to the points above mentioned. [!]

The programme of the second concert, Jan. 3, was as follows:

Overture. "Leonora," No. 8.... ..Beethoven.

Concerto, A minor, op. 54.....Schumann.
Anton Rubinstein

Anton Rubinstein.
Concerto for Violin, No. 5.....Vleuxtemps.

Overture "Dimitri Donskoi" Rubinstein

Overture. "Dimitri Donskoi".....Rubinstein.
(Rondo.....Mozart.

Gligue.....	Handel.
Air and Variations.....	Handel.

Anton Rubinstein.

Faust Fantalsie.....Wieniawski.
Henry Wieniawski.

Rakoczy March..... Liszt.

Rubinstein gave the best rendering I have ever heard of that magnificent work which is undoubtedly heard of that magnificent work which is undoubtedly the pianoforte concerto of modern days, in comparison with which others are as pigmies in the shadow of Colossus. No less wonderful, though of a very different character, was the power by which he subdued Rubinstein and substituted Mozart and Handel, in his performance of the quaint classical Rondo, Air and Gigue. The applause was so hearty and sincere that, quite contrary to his usual custom, he returned to the piano, and, much to our surprise and delight, played Chopin's exquisite study in C-sharp minor (op. 12, No. 7) as I have never before heard it. Then, being fairly in the Chopin mood, with scarcely a pause he dashed into the Etude in A minor (Op. 25, No. 12), of which he gave such a perfect rendering that I was inclined to leave the hall feeling that there could be no more music for that night at least. I remained, however, and heard Wieniawski's Fantasia: a bold and musician-like work, in which the themes are beautifully handled, and by no means stale or commonplace, as such compositions usually are.

I must postpone mention of Messrs. Mills and Damrosch's fourth soirée, and various other matters which demand attention, until my next letter.

A. A. C.

NEW YORK, DEC. 23.—At the second concert of the Philharmonic Society, Dec. 14, Raff's Symphony, in G minor, No. 4 (new) was performed. Though not differing materially in style from those works of the same composer with which we are already familiar, this symphony is well worth hearing and, indeed, must be heard several times before its merits can be fully appreciated. The first few bars of the introductory Allegro furnish a key to the whole Symphony; a dreamy mystical beauty, as of "Those hills whose flowers ne'er fed the bee :

That shore no ship has ever seen."

pervades it all. This movement contains a very graceful fragment of melody for the violoncello (exquisitely rendered by Mr. Bergner), which is afterwards taken up by the reeds. The Scherzo, which follows, is quite intricate, and is scored in a manner which shows the composer to be thoroughly master of the resources of an orchestra. In the Andante there is a series of massive and sustained chords leading to nothing in particular, and it is here that the work seemed to me weakest. The Finale, however, is both effective and interesting.

The work was very coldly received by an audience which was evidently unequal to the task of forming an opinion for itself. The other orchestral pieces were the "Liebescene," from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," and the fine "Consecration of the House" Overture, in C major, by Beethoven.

The orchestra, conducted by Carl Bergmann, now numbers one hundred performers, including 38 violins, 14 violas, 13 violoncellos, 15 double basses, 2 flutes, 1 piccolo, 2 oboes, 2 clarionets, 1 corno anglaise, 2 bassoons, 4 horns, 2 trumpets, 3 trombones, and tympani. Among the violins we recognize the familiar faces of Messrs. Matzka, Bristow, Noll, Hill, Mosenthal and others, who are not only valuable members of the orchestra but excellent soloists. The orchestral selections at this concert were well rendered, although the performers never play as well at the beginning as towards the end of the season.

The vocalist was Miss ANNA DRASDIL, who sang recently at one of the Mills-Damrosch soirées. Her selections were: "Spirit Song," Haydn; "Prayer" by Hiller, and Ballad by Pissuti. Miss Drasdil's fine contralto voice sounded well in the Academy, its peculiar metallic quality being less noticeable there than in Steinway's music-room. She sang, as I judge she always does, with such earnest and tender feeling, that her success was assured from the first. She divided the honors of the evening with Herr BENNO WALTER, (announced as solo violinist to the King of Bavaria,) who played the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto. He played with much skill, and drew from his violin a very pure, sweet tone; but his bowing was not strong, and he was unequal to a full interpretation of what the giant composer says in his great Concerto. This, however, was no special discredit to the young artist, for there are very few violinists who can play that Concerto as it should be played.

The next Philharmonic Concert will take place on January 18th, 1873. The works in rehearsal are Schumann's second symphony, in C major, Weber's "Oberon" overture and the "Hirtengesang" from Liszt's Oratorio, "Christus." Messrs. Mills and Damrosch gave their third soirée of Chamber music on Dec. 19th, with the following programme: Suite, E major, op. 11, Goldmark; Air from the "Magic Flute," Mozart; Serenade (string trio), Beethoven; Swedisch Lied, V. Berge; Sonata, A minor, Schumann. Miss Jenny Busk was the singer.

PHILADELPHIA, DEC. 27.—On Saturday afternoon Gounod's Faust was given at the Academy of Music by the Maretzek Troupe. The performance was mournful, owing to the palpable indisposition of Mme. Lucca; but the brave little lady bore up heroically, omitting, however, the church scene and some of the third act. Sig. Vizzani's poor little voice struggled with the massive orchestration quite successfully; indeed his "Salve dimora" was very well rendered. Jamet's singing and acting as Mephisto were up to his usual high standard.

On Monday evening, owing to Miss Kellogg's continued indisposition, and Mme. Lucca being ill of diphtheria, Mignon was withdrawn and Lucrezia Borgia sung instead, Mme. Levielle taking the title role, with Signor Abrugnado as Gennaro, and Sig. Coulon as "Il Duca." The audience was sparse, and the performance only passable. This was the last appearance of the troupe for this engagement, as Mme. Lucca's medical attendants considered it dangerous for her to sing for some time, and Miss Kellogg continued to be hors de combat.

Of course every opera habitué has been comparing Lucca with Nilsson. It is hardly fair to compare these artists vocally, as their voices and vocalization are so different. Lucca's voice is a broad, powerful mezzo-soprano, while Nilsson's is almost a soprano acuto, with a much more mellow ring, and much more soulful. But Lucca is far greater in her histrionic deportment than the fair Swede. As to the troupes it is difficult to decide to which to accord the supremacy. Certainly Capoul and Brignoli were far stronger in their stations than are Vizzani and Abrugnado, the tenor of the present troupe. Moriarni, the baritone of the Maretzek Troupe, has a fine voice, more powerful and richer than that of Mons. Barre; but Miss Cary so completely outshines the lady holding the corresponding position in the Lucca Troupe, that, despite the undoubted attraction of this company in possessing Miss Kellogg, I am ready to confirm the opinion of the majority in awarding the disputed laurels to the Nilsson company. Mr. Maretzek advertises his intention to return here on March 24th, and complete his necessarily unfinished engagement.

Harvard Musical Association.

The fourth SYMPHONY CONCERT came with the great snow-storm of the winter, (the day after Christmas), when hosts of music-lovers were kept at home by too truthful a presentiment that in a few hours the roads would be blockaded. Yet when one reached the Music Hall, was it not most cheerful and encouraging to see an audience in numbers and in character quite worthy of so classical a feast upon so large a scale? Some of them, no doubt, experienced "labors, dangers and sufferings" in getting home, yet felt their bravery rewarded. The orchestra was full, and well prepared; the programme one to charm away all thought of "winter and rough weather."

Overture to "Faniaka".....Cherubini.
*Concert Aria [Tenor]: "Misero, O sogno, o son desto?".....Mozart.
Nelson Varley.
*Symphony, in E flat [Breitkopf & Haertel. No. 1. Haydn.
Pianoforte Concerto, in F minor, op. 21.....Chopin.
George W. Sumner.
*Air: "The enemy said.".....Handel.
Nelson Varley.
Overture: "Becalmed at Sea and Happy Voyage." Mendelssohn.

The E-flat Symphony of Haydn, opening with a roll from the tympani, was oftener heard in Boston twenty years ago than almost any of the genial master's works; we do not remember to have heard it for a dozen years at least, nor, (as the star indicates), is it one of the dozen Haydn Symphonies which had figured in the programmes of these Concerts. It is one of the largest, fullest, most elaborate and serious of them all, at the same time that it is full of his usual cheerful spontaneity and sunshine. The sombre and majestic introduction, with drum roll swelling and diminishing, followed by a deep, slow unison passage by the contrabassi and bassoons, is as night before day to the gladsome, swiftly gliding Allegro, with its bright and happy themes, which are wrought out with perfect art, so clear and positive down to the least detail, so subtly interwoven, and all developing as happily and freely as if it were all Nature's growth. It is a pity that the deepest tones of the bassoon are so difficult to make; it is almost impossible to subdue them to the pp required in these opening measures and be sure of getting any tone at all; so that on the whole we would as soon hear the passage as it used to be done here, when we were scant of bassoons, by the double basses alone. The Andante, with its beautiful, broad, noble minor theme, alternating with the swelling triumph of the stately major, is exceedingly impressive; and the variations through which both are carried,—including the fine florid (yet deliberate) solo for the leading violin, capably played by Mr. EICHBERG, whom we see smiling at the almost child-like simplicity and innocence of the little chord cadence at the end of the melody,—seemed an exhaustless series of fresh surprises and delights. They are not mere feats of ingenuity, they are poetic, too, and full of genius. Beautiful as the whole Symphony is, we are inclined to think the Finale, with its most graceful pregnant melody, first heralded and then accompanied by a mellow horn motive, the most beautiful of all; its whole development is most felicitous and full of subtle charm. The rendering of the whole work was almost faultless.

Cherubini's charming Overture to "Faniaka," given twice before, was sure of a warm welcome, and did not disappoint. Mendelssohn's Overture, illustrating Goethe's little poem: "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt," in which are expressed the contrasted feelings of a lifeless calm at sea, and the excitement of a rising breeze, a lively passage, bringing the good ship into port, is one of the happiest specimens of "picture music" in existence. It was played with admirable spirit and precision; the instruments which lend the play of rich tone color all sounded well, and the suggestions to the mind were vivid.

Chopin's F-minor Concerto was a high mark for the ambition of a young pianist. As a mere task of virtuosity, it demands great force and finish of technique to keep oneself erect and walk without stumbling, with ease, with neither anxious awkwardness nor dogged nonchalance and coolness, over the intricate long course beset with difficulties of every kind. Mr. SUMNER's rendering was well conceived, clear, firm, carefully elaborated. Had it been Hummel's Septet or any composition of that kind, the rendering would have been highly satisfactory. But it was Chopin, and required a kindred inspiration, which was not very manifest in the performance. Highly creditable as it was to the talent, the diligently acquired skill, and the loyal spirit in which he approached the task, the rendering was not in the highest sense successful. If there was no mistaken, false expression, there was no pervading sympathetic glow; and listeners, who have been transported more than once to the third heavens by this rare poetic work, appeared to wonder where the charm had vanished to, seeing that the whole thing lay before them in such photographic accuracy. Yet there was so much of excellent musicianship in the performance, that the confession of this disappointment is almost an injustice to the young pianist. The only mistake was in the selection of the work; one may be an excellent pianist, and yet not one at whose touch such a creation comes to life so as to live to those who listen. As it was, the effort merits high praise; but in some other work we feel sure the performer would have done himself, as well as his author, much more justice. There is too much good stuff in him, to let this discourage him.

Mr. NELSON VARLEY comes from the land of lusty English voices; he is a Yorkshire man; quite young, not more than twenty-five, we think; so small in stature, that his robust, large tones surprise you. He has a manly, healthy look; is full of animation and nervous quickness, easy and agreeable in manner, with a certain frank, fresh, and winning cordiality in his aspect. The foundation of his vocal training was laid at the Conservatoire in Brussels, whither he was sent by the Chevalier Lemmens, the husband of Mme. Sherrington, who undertook the whole charge of his education, and to whom he has been for the past six years an "articled" pupil, singing in choir, oratorio and concert, in various parts of England, mostly in the present interest of his patron, but in the future interest of himself. This contract expired in November, and he comes now a free man to join for a while the fortunes of Mme. Rudersdorff in America. His appearance in this concert, therefore, was almost literally, his first "coming out." And his success was instant and complete.

Mr. Varley has a very sweet, full, ringing tenor voice, of good compass, evenly developed, well schooled. He knows how to sing, and is equal to whatever he undertakes, which, when we consider that his chief sphere has been oratorio, is saying a good deal. His recitative is excellent; his holding out and shading of the tone, his phrasing and expression in cantabile, are all that could be asked of one yet in his early prime. And there is a manly fire, a truthful, honest ring in his strong passages, to which the hearer yields himself most willingly. In the Handelian roulades, and in all florid passages, his vocalization is very even, accurate, and easily sustained. There is now and then a little dryness in a tone or two, but the golden quality of the voice seems all the richer in emerging from the momentary veil.

The Concert Aria by Mozart, one of the noblest, most impassioned, and most difficult of the twelve isolated scenes of this sort which he wrote for various voices, was wholly new to Mr. Varley until he studied it for this occasion, since his arrival in this country. His speedy mastery of it speaks well for his musicianship. The entire rendering was intelligent, artistic, fervent and effective; nor was it a small thing for the voice to maintain its supremacy amid the rich and by itself singularly attractive orchestral accompaniment of Mozart.

The very trying air from Israel in Egypt: "The enemy said, I will pursue," so seldom sung, was substituted for "Love sounds the alarm" from Acis and Galatea, owing to the impossibility of procuring suitable accompaniments in season, Handel having left the score of that entire Cantata (Serenade) incomplete, it being his wont to fill out the harmony himself as he presided at the harpsichord or organ. Mendelssohn has filled out the instrumentation of Acis, but we know not whether his parts are published. The young tenor sang it with right manly energy, and an unflagging, clean and even execution in the long-breathed figured passages, which quite electrified the audience, and he was obliged to repeat it. The only exception we should take to the whole effort was to the occasional indulgence in those tricks of effect which have become the fashion and tradition among English singers, but which surely would have aroused the lion wrath of Handel; for instance the throwing up of the voice upon a high, long note by way of final cadence; this savors too much of the foot-lights, and seems to say: Mark me, my voice, no matter what old Handel meant.—Mr. Varley will be pretty sure to fill an important place in our best oratorio and concert music, if he remains with us.

The Concert of this week had for programme: Overture to "Coriolan," Beethoven; Piano Concerto in G minor, Moscheles [J. C. D. PARKER]; Overture to "Les Abencerrages" [The Moors in Spain], Cherubini; Oboe Concerto, in F minor, Biets [ADD. KUTZLER], first time; Symphony, No. 6, in C, [not the "Jupiter"], Mozart. Too late for a review this week.

The following [sixth] concert will be four weeks, instead of the usual fortnight, later. Among its novelties will be; the first movement of Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony; the "Concertistueck," in G, by Schumann, played by B. J. LANG, with orchestra; the D-minor Concerto of Bach for three pianos, &c.

Rubinstein and Wieniawski.—Farewell Concerts.

A worse time could not have been chosen for these great artists to revisit Boston. To say nothing of the effects of the great fire, the first two concerts came on Christmas eve and on the evening of Christmas, and there was of course a melancholy show of empty seats; on Friday evening and Saturday afternoon the attendance was much better, although the hall was very far from full. Yet the four concerts brought delight to quite a goodly number of the best music-lovers, with not a few of whom, ladies especially, the admiration for the Russian artist amounts to a decided hero-worship. It must be remembered, too, that these were really chamber concerts given in the vast Music Hall; for a small hall, better fitted for such music, any one of these four audiences would have been a large one. There was no orchestra; the largest combination was that of Trios for piano, violin and cello, one for the opening of each concert. And it must be confessed that Trio playing is at disadvantage in so large a place, and so is Trio hearing. The great op. 97 of Beethoven, in B flat, was almost lost there; WULF FAIRBANKS's violoncello was in parts but feebly heard, and Rubinstein in the piano part, quite loyal and unpretentious, seemed not beyond comparison with other artists who have played it here. The Mendelssohn Trio in C minor told more effectively; and the two of Rubinstein's own composition (in B flat major and in G minor—the former given last Spring in Mr. Lang's concerts), though captivating by their individuality, and sometimes even by their eccentricity, yet doubtless in many produced just that perplexed, uncertain feeling of half acceptance, which would have been much more positive, the one way or the other, after a closer hearing in a smaller room. In his piano solos, even there, Rubinstein is always clearly heard, and Wieniawski's tone is very telling even in the Trios.

No pianist ever has produced so deep an impression here as Rubinstein by the intensity and individuality of his genius, by the complete losing of himself in the music which for the time being he interprets, and by his wonderful execution, unequalled hitherto in our experience alike for its electric energy and force and for its subtle delicacy. But there is no need of repeating here, even if it might be done with other words and fanciful analogies, what has been said before of his transcendent qualities as a performer. Nor on the other hand are we, on growing more familiar with his art, relieved, as we had hoped to be, from the impression of too frequent traits of wilfulness and sometimes positively wild exaggeration in the midst of so much that is beyond criticism, wholly admirable in his reproductions. Thus it seemed hardly fair to the unpretending naiveté of the little Mozart Rondo in A minor, innocent little flower, to transplant it into the Chopin conservatory, refining its simplicity and freshness all away. And some of Handel's healthy movements were intensified and magnified beyond their real aim, we thought.

On the other hand we must give the artist credit for giving us Bach pure et simple, not overcharged at all with his own individuality. But in his very grandest, most exciting revelations of the fire within him, where he almost takes your breath away, as in that tremendous Chopin Scherzo in B minor, which he played at the end of the first concert instead of the Fantasia set down in the programme, and in the great Polonaise he plays so often, one must ask after all, however much he may have been carried away for the time being, whether such effects are not more astonishing than wise, and whether Art in her pure, impersonal, ideal court can ever set her seal divine upon them. Could Mendelssohn have ever dreamed of such a storm and whirlwind of passion as we witnessed Friday night, when he composed that noble series of "Variations sérieuses"? These musical, and as it were elemental, orgasms are well described in a sentence which we copy from the New York Tribune: "Once or twice in the course of the piece the music poured forth from his hands, as it often does, in a torrent so impetuous that the rhythm was entirely overpowered, and the ear caught nothing but a tempest of glorious sounds, just as in some of the pictures of Turner, the eye loses the perception of form in a blaze of gorgeous color."

The wide range of his interpretations, through such a variety of forms and styles and masters,—and all played from memory, all first absorbed into himself and then given out with all the concentrated energies of his whole soul and brain,—was one of the great attractions of these, as of all his concerts.

When has such a wealth of pianoforte compositions been heard in a single week? He gave us the famous old "Cat's Fugue" Sonata of Domenico Scarlatti. Of Bach he let us hear some of the old favorites from the "Well-tempered Clavier," as well as the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue; of Handel, an Air and Variation in E, and Gigue; of Beethoven, the great Trio in B flat; of Mendelssohn, the Trio in C minor, the Variations sérieuses, the Scherzo appassionato, and several Songs without Words, including the Volkslied; of Schubert, the Rondo with Violin; of Chopin, the great Scherzo aforesaid, various Préludes and Etudes [from the simplest to the greatest], one of the finest Nocturnes, and the impassioned Polonaise; of Schumann, a string of little pieces: "Warum? Vogel als Prophet," "Abends" and "Traumes-wirren," all of which he played most exquisitely; one of Field's beautiful Nocturnes; Liszt's "Don Juan" Fantasia; and, besides the Trios, some captivating little pieces of his own,—two groups of them. The first consisted of a Nocturne, Scherzo and Etudes; the second, of a "Miniature Minuet" [quaintly, almost pedantically, antique], a Serenade, Valse, a little brook-side scene, very fascinating, and a new Barcarole.

Here Wieniawski's violin playing was throughout so masterly, so pure, that we can but marvel at what our New York correspondent says of his performance of the Beethoven Concerto. He played, besides his own best things (a rich variety), the Elegie by Ernst; the Air from the orchestral Suite (set down an octave), and a most brilliant florid Prélude of Bach; some things by Vieuxtemps, by Rubinstein, &c.

In Prospect.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.—In spite of the winter's calamities, from which all musical enterprises in Boston more or less have suffered, at least three very interesting series of Matinees [not counting those of the Conservatories] now invite us.

1. The first of the three unique entertainments arranged by MME. RUDERSDORFF, was given at Mechanics' Hall last Tuesday before a very cultivated audience. The illness of Miss LIEBE caused some disturbing alterations of the programme: only at the last moment was a violinist [Mr. KRAUSE] found to take her place in the Sonata in D by Bach, of which the piano part was firmly and distinctly rendered by Miss MARY UNDERWOOD. This was to have opened the concert; but instead of it the same young lady, whose modest grace and earnest absorption in her music won warm favor, played the Beethoven Sonata in D, op. 10, for Piano solo, for the most part in an intelligent, firm, noble style, though in parts the execution was a little stiff and lame; but it was a first appearance and doubtless not without embarrassment. MME. Rudersdorff herself, though not in her best voice, made a very fine impression by her singing of two pieces wholly new to Boston: an air from Mendelssohn's early operetta, "Camacho's Wedding," and Handel's famous "Harpsichord Song": "Voilà la guerre." Miss ALICE FAIRMAN appeared to excellent advantage both in Haydn's "Spirit Song," and as the principal "Maïed" in a very beautiful composition by Rubinstein ["Die Nixen"], with four accompanying female voices, who likewise sang charmingly. Mr. Nelson Varley sang Handel's "Deeper and deeper still" and "Wait her, angels," with pure artistic style and pathos; and there was rare sweetness in his rendering of Ch. Salaman's music to the little song by Shelley: "I arise from dreams of thee." Owing to a slight hoarseness from cold, however, his fine upper tones did not come out with so much ease as in the Symphony Concert. The piano accompaniments were played by Mr. W. F. Apthorp.—We have no room to do full justice to the good things of the programme, which as a whole was somewhat too sombre, albeit full of interesting novelties, and can only add that the two remaining matinees will be on the Tuesday afternoons, Jan. 21, and Feb. 4.

2. Next in order come four classical matinees, at the same hall, by MME. Camilla Urso, on successive Wednesdays, beginning Jan. 22. String Quartets [not to be a treat to hear one led by her?] Trios with piano Violin Sonatas, &c. by old masters like Corelli and a violin and Cello, compose the rare temptations.

3. Messrs. Hugo Leonhard and Julius Eichberg announce that their postponed series of six Musical Matinees will be given in Wesleyan Hall, on the following dates: Jan. 31, Feb. 14, March 7 and 21, April 4 and 18. It will be pleasantly remembered that these Matinees were among the most enjoyable and interesting of the musical entertainments given last season. We trust they may be patronized according to their high desert, as they are of the utmost value to the lover of what is good and true in musical art. In the familiarity they give with some of the most delightful compositions of the classical masters. Tickets for the series may now be procured at the music stores and at the Boston Conservatory of Music.—Gazette.

ORATORIO. 8.—The Handel and Haydn Society are rehearsing "Judas Maccabæus" and "Elijah" for performance Feb. 8th and 9th with MME. Rudersdorff, Miss Fairman and M. Nelson Varley.

Music in London.

BRITISH ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.—Of this new organization, which gave its first concert in St. James's Hall on Thursday evening, Dec. 5, the Times informs us:

Since the Society of British Musicians, founded in 1834, was dissolved, there has been no combination of any importance among English orchestral players, who, nevertheless are notoriously equal, in a general sense, to any in Europe—a fact which foreign composers, such as Meyerbeer, Spohr, and Mendelssohn, freely acknowledged. No feeling of prejudice, much less of hostility, towards the many admirable instrumentalists, Italian, French, and German, who reside among us, and who exercise so large an influence on the efficiency of high-class per-

Evenings at the Theatre in Italy.*

Florence, Sept. 1872.

September, most people know, is not the time to gain musical or theatrical experience in Italy. The great opera houses are still reposing in their summer sleep; singers, musicians, and composers have flitted; only a few theatres of lower rank cater for the inevitable art-wants of the public who have remained at home, and of strangers. I was, however, so far favored by chance, that the Milan Scala—in honor of the presence of the King of Italy—was opened for a few evenings. Weber's opera of Der Freischütz was selected for performance. The large posters gave the title in German; it was only underneath that there was in smaller type: Il Franco Cacciatore. This version, by the way, is a little innovation and improvement on the name formerly in use: Il Fr neo Arciero, which, (like the French franc-archer), is suggestive of a cross-bow, and, consequently, clashes with the casting of bullets. Der Freischütz was never performed at the Scala before last winter. German operatic music has penetrated very slowly into Italy; now for the first time is it really taking root there. Even with Mozart's original Italian operas, Don Giovanni, and Le Nozze di Figaro, it was not till 1815 and 1816 that any attempt was made to produce them in Milan, an attempt immediately afterward abandoned for years. It is not astonishing, therefore, that an eminently German composer like Weber should remain still longer unknown and unintelligible to the Roman peoples. We know to what a process of botching Der Freischütz was subjected before it could, as Robin des Bois, be assimilated to the French taste. It is less generally known that Weber's Preciosa was given, for the first and last time, at the Odéon, Paris, on the 19th November, 1825, and proved an utter failure. Even in England, where Weber received such extraordinary marks of respect and popularity, it is incredible how Der Freischütz was altered, and how many additions were made to it, before it suited the public taste. The celebrated tenor Braham, as Max, introduced the old song: "Good Night," and an English Polacca; Miss Stephens, as Agatha, had the duet in the second act omitted, and substituted a trivial folk's-song; while new personages, such as an Innkeeper, a Scotch water-nymph, and so on, were, without any ceremony, written in. Every one who expected something similar at the Scala was most agreeably disappointed. The performance was a faithful and complete one, bearing evident marks of a reverential feeling towards the original. The spoken dialogue, however, which the Italians will on no conditions accept, and which would be doubly objectionable in so large a house, was changed into recitative. It must be confessed that the recitative satisfied reasonable expectations, and was intelligently and modestly composed; in certain important passages, the three dull bass-pizzicatos of the Samiel-motive were appropriately introduced as a reminiscence. Signor Faccio is the young man who wrote the recitatives, and conducted Der Freischütz with praiseworthy repose and certainty at the Scala. The conductor in Italian theatres does not, as among us, sit immediately behind the prompter's box, but at the lower end of the orchestra, on a high arm-chair, the back of which nearly touches the first row of stalls. The old Italian custom of conducting at a piano in front appears dying out; it was attended with great advantages to the singers; the conductor was in immediate connection with them, while at present he can better look over and keep together the orchestra. In so spacious an orchestra, as that at the Scala, where the four double-bass players posted on the extreme right can hear nothing of the four on the extreme left, this plan is almost indispensable.

As regards the singing, we must admire the powerful voices which, without effort, could triumph over the immense space, as much as we must praise the acoustic qualities of the structure, which contributed so greatly to the favorable result. The company consisted entirely of Italians. This imparted to Weber's music a slightly Italian tinge. But no one can assert that the mode in which the music was rendered in any way disfigured or did injustice to it. The singers treated their parts seriously, and did not take the liberty of making any alterations. It is true that an Italian singer brings out the separate phrases sharply and impressively, while his expression is generally pathetic, and worked up to a more than ordinary pitch. Thus no one was surprised that Max's yearnings, Agatha's dreamy intensity, and Aennchen's jokes, were invested with a pathetic character, and, in their musical contours, stood out more strongly and more plastically than in the German rendering. Max was sung by Signor Tasca, a tenor possessing a vigorous chest voice; and, in his acting, neither better nor worse than the average run of our German representatives of the part. Of more significance was the Caspar of Signor Maini. A deep and powerful bass voice, combined with most energetic and, sometimes, it is true, somewhat harsh acting, produce a most decidedly telling effect. Unfortunately, the singer was always compelled to omit in the drinking song the high F sharp, which he could not reach. The genial and characteristic piece is attended with a slight drawback for the artist; it invariably ends abruptly, and in an unfavorable part of the register. Signor Maini, by-the-by, aided his dumb play, by appropriating, as it were, the short orchestral postlude; after a few suggestive and dance-like movements, he raised and set down vigorously his glass on the two final notes of the orchestra (the octave B flat to B flat), doing this so strictly in time, and with such sharply marked rhythm, that it almost seemed as if it was he who sang the two notes; he thus obtained a more effective ending. Aennchen was a sprightly young vocalist with a powerful mezzo-soprano, Signora Pasqua. She was more satisfactory than Signora Mariani-Masi, whose voice, with a strange tendency to the tremolo, had already lost the melting freshness of youth. Signora Mariani, however, gave out her high notes with great force and passion; and, to judge from the applause, appeared to be a popular favorite. The piece was mostly mounted after the German model, with the exception of some amusing instances of geographical license, such, for example, as the transplantation, in the first act, to Bohemia of a Swiss Chalet and the costume of Meraner peasants. The scene of the Wolf's Glen was well painted; the ghostly business, appropriate, except that there were too many red devils gracing the casting of the bullets with their gymnastic exercises. It seemed strange that Samiel should speak in his usual voice, like any other actor, and that, when Caspar is casting the bullets, his exclamations (One! Two!) should be answered by no echo. From many similar details, and from the peculiarly ballet-like character of the whole spirit world, it was easy to perceive that the Italians are wanting in due appreciation of legendary lore. For them, the German legend takes the form of a cheerful antique, a sort of classical Walpurgis night, in the ballet style. Emphatic praise is due to the management of the Scala for not being led away by recent examples in Germany, and for giving Der Freischütz as it was written, in three acts; not detaching the Wolf's Glen to make a separate act of it. On the other hand, the Italians still retain the bad practice of interpolating a separate ballet in several acts, in the midst of the opera. The curtain, which fell upon the horrors of the Wolf's Glen, disclosed, when it was raised again, not Agatha's chamber, but a magnificent and dazzling scene in a grand ballet: Bianca di Nevers. The connection between the different parts of Der Freischütz is fearfully cut up by this plan, the sweet after-effect of the music killed, and our feeling for the third act destroyed. But how great is the power of an old theatrical tradition, no matter how absurd! It was unwillingly that we sacrificed the third act, but it did not commence till after the conclusion of the ballet, that is, till about half-past eleven. Judging from what I saw of this ballet, I should say that the reputation once enjoyed by the Milan school of dancing is not likely to fade; some of the solo lady-dancers were excellent, and evolutions of large masses were executed with dazzling precision. The scenery and dresses were nothing unusual, being decidedly far behind those at the Operahouse, Vienna. On the other hand, a festive harvest procession, which brought the first act of Bianca di Nevers to a conclusion, formed an extremely charming picture; real goats and lambs, led by joyous children, came first; they were followed by a gigantic harvest waggon, drawn by oxen. The whole thing, reminding one of L. Robert's "Roman Reapers," was arranged and carried out with eminent pictorial skill.

In Bologna, people still speak with pride of the highly praiseworthy performance of Lohengrin, last winter, and, also, of the preparations for Tannhäuser, this season. If the enthusiasms of the Italians for Lohengrin was genuine, there can be no doubt as to the still greater success of Tannhäuser. In the hairdressers' shops, you see exposed for sale "Lohengrin Soap," and "Lohengrin Kalydor," while preparations are already commenced for the manufacture of "Tannhäuser Sausages." I arrived unfortunately too late to hear, at the second largest theatre in Bologna, Così fan Tutte, "a most celebrated opera, quite new in Bologna, by the Maestro Mozart." Like the introduction of German operas by C. M. Weber and R. Wagner into the Italian repertory, so also this revival of old masterpieces is a noticeable sign of the turn taken by musical matters in Italy. In Florence, too, old operas, especially the comic operas of Cimarosa, are played at a small theatre, called the Teatro degli Arrischiati (Theatre of the Riskers, or Darers). This is something quite new, and, up to the present time, has been done only at second-rate theatres. The large Italian theatres, especially the Scala, give scarcely anything but novelties. It is characteristic of the Italians that they feel no want, like the French, of seeing the old classical repertory regularly performed. The advance towards German operatic music, and the revival of old classical works, are, it is true, at present, only isolated indications, but, taken in connection with other signs, they may be looked upon as signaling a change of taste. One of these signs is undoubtedly the increasing proficiency in orchestral playing. A short time since, I heard, at a theatre of inferior rank, the Teatro delle Loggie, at Florence, Plotow's last opera, L'Ombra, a shadow which has, also, several times flitted across our Wiedener Theatre in Vienna. A remarkable thing for me was the correct, nay, delicate performance of the orchestra, which accomplished, in a highly satisfactory manner, the by no means easy task of rendering the very refined and delicate score. Fifteen or twenty years ago, such an orchestral performance would have been entirely out of the question in a small Italian Theatre. One fact more. When I heard some operatic performances, fifteen years since, at Milan and Venice, the barbarous practice of the conductor's marking the time aloud by striking his music-stand with his conducting stick, was at its zenith, being at most theatres facilitated by a brass plate let into the music-stand on purpose. I was filled with sorrowful amazement to find that, in this particular, Italy had made no progress since Goethe wrote the following remarkable words on a musical entertainment in Venice (1786): "I should have enjoyed it very much, had not the confounded conductor marked the time with a roll of music against the railing, and in as barefaced a manner as though he had to do with a lot of urchins at school, whom he was instructing; his tapping was quite unnecessary, and spoilt every impression, just as any one would, who, to render a beautiful statue comprehensible for us, were to stick scarlet rags round the joints. The foreign sound destroys all the harmony. The man is a musician, yet he does not hear this, or rather he chooses that attention shall be directed by an impropriety to his presence, while he would do better to allow his value to be estimated by the perfection of the performance. The public appear used to the practice. It is not the only instance of people's fancying that something tends to enjoyment which destroys enjoyment." Well, this time I did not meet with this objectionable practice, either during the performance of Der Freischütz, at the Scala, nor at Florence, with Flotow's Shador, nor even with Verdi's Macbeth, at the Teatro Pagliano. This, as most persons are aware, is the second theatre as regards size in Florence; the first, the Pergola, being at present closed. The Teatro Pagliano certainly goes to the extreme limit in the simplicity of its decorations; the entire front of the house inside is painted white; not a gold border, not a colored arabesque is to be seen on the boxes or galleries. The singers on the stage endeavor, by glaring tints, to make the audience forget this sober uniformity of color. That the beautiful art of singing has already considerably sunk, and is still sinking, in Italy, is something that I did not require to visit the Teatro Pagliano to learn. But the Macbeth couple gave me fresh confirmation of the fact that coarse, crude singing is on the increase, and also of another; that, despite everything, Italy is still the country of favored voices. Thanks to the voluptuous and silvery tone of her full soprano voice, which streams forth without the slightest effort, Signora Pappini, the representative of Lady Macbeth, reminds one of the Medori in her best days. School and cultivation have done little for such materials, and still less for the singer of Macbeth, Signor Borgioli. Yet—how seldom does such a stately, heroic figure, with so sonorous a voice, grow upon the soil of Germany! All the other performers in Macbeth were very unimportant. Happily, no independent ballet was interpolated; Macbeth was given "con danza analoga," that is to say: with a dance "appropriate" to the action, a dance which was as inappropriate as possible in conjunction with the fearful spectral apparitions of the play.

I may mention, as a curious fact, that we saw here, at the Teatro Nicolini, Florence, a company of French artists play Offenbach's Princesse de Trébizonde in the most wretched manner it is possible to conceive. The women were ugly and stiff; the men, without the slightest pretence to comicality about them. All were without talent or voice. The part of Paola was sustained by a man who spoke in a hoarse bass voice, and endeavored to produce his comic effects by running down, gnashing his teeth, to the footlights, and making faces at the pit. The performance of the French visitors was the more scandalous, because second and third class Italian companies are excellent in comedy. In Florence and Genoa, comedies are now admirably performed in open-day-theatres (such a place is styled a "Politeama") to a smoking and beer-drinking pit. I have enjoyed, in the course of my life, very few opportunities of seeing Italian actors, and I imagined that they would not lay aside in their spoken drama the passionate violence and the pathos of their operatic performances. How astonished I was to find among their actors such moderation in the portrayal of emotion, such sobriety, in their comic impersonations, so much repose and so much dignity! At the newly-erected Politeama, very beautifully situated on the Aqua Sola Promenade, Genoa, they were playing a new piece of modern society: Cuor di Donna (Woman's Heart), a production distinguished for long, never-ending dialogue, and paucity of plot. It is written by a young local author named Tito d'Asti, whose personal friends and enemies divided themselves into two opposite camps, and, applauding, cheering, hissing, and whistling, waged a little internecine war. That the hisses gradually grew silent, and ended by not disturbing the applause, was due principally to the good acting. The ladies especially displayed such delicacy and natural truthfulness in their performance; such propriety in their bearing; and, above all, so captivating a vivacity in their bye-play and the expression they conveyed with their eyes, that the spectator would at once have supposed he beheld actresses of high repute before him. Yet the theatre was only an Arena, and the actresses were scarcely better paid than choristers with us. Perfectly the same thing is to be seen at the Arena in Florence, where, also, social pieces of a high stamp are given, a proof how strong dramatic talent is in Italy, and how deeply it is rooted in the people. But, in all these theatres, the music between the acts is something terrible; the instruments are all brass, and the musicians are nothing better than so many musical mechanics. They look with envy on their colleagues of the big drum, for they are the only ones who can play with a cigar in their mouths! The bands, too, of the regular army and of the National Guard, who play on Sundays in the public gardens—in the Cascine, at Florence, on the Aqua Sola at Genoa, and in the Giardino Pubblico, at Milan—are far beneath similar bands at Vienna. They are reed bands, and their members simply work off, on bad instruments, a certain number of polkas and operatic cavatinas.

There is one remark which I cannot conclude without making, though the extremely limited sphere of my Italian experience does not justify me in ascribing to it any general application. At the theatrical performances which I was enabled to attend, I found very little enthusiasm among the public, and I observed that, neither in coffee-houses nor in the public thoroughfares, were music and the stage discussed with such animation as formerly. Even after subtracting from this comparative want of interest the portion we must attribute to the summer season, there is still a remainder not to be overlooked.

I believe I have found the explanation of this fact in an old book, Stendhal's Correspondence inédite. The refined connoisseur, and enthusiastic admirer of Italy, wrote, in September, 1825, that is to say, forty-seven years ago, from Naples, the following prophecy word for word: "Le jour où l'Italie aura les deux chambres, le jour où l'opinion fera son entrée dans le gouvernement, elle ne sera plus exclusivement occupée de musique, de peinture, d'architecture, et ces trois arts tomberont rapidement."

Waves of Sound, Water and Light.

[From Prof. TYNDALL'S Lectures on LIGHT]

In the earliest writings of the ancients we find the notion that sound is conveyed by the air. Aristotle gives expression to this notion, and the great architect, Vitruvius, compares the waves of sound to waves of water. But the real mechanism of wave motion was hidden from the ancients, and indeed was not made clear until the time of Newton. The central difficulty of the subject was to distinguish between the motion of the wave itself and the motion of the particles which at any moment constitute the wave.

Stand upon the seashore and observe the advancing rollers before they are distorted by the friction of the bottom. Every wave has a back and front, and if you clearly seize the image of the moving wave you will see that every particle of water along the front of the wave is in the act of rising, while every particle along its back is in the act of sinking. The particles in front reach in succession the crest of the wave, and as soon as the crest is passed they begin to fall. They then reach the furrow or sinus of the wave, and can sink no further. Immediately afterward they become the front of the succeeding wave, rise again until they reach the crest, and then sink as before. Thus, while the waves pass onward horizontally, the individual particles are simply lifted up and down vertically. Observe a sea fowl, or, if you are a swimmer, abandon yourself to the action of the waves; you are not carried forward, but simply rocked up and down. The propagation of a wave is the propagation of a form, and not the transference of the substance which constitutes the wave.

The length of the wave is the distance from crest to crest, while the distance through which the individual particles oscillate is called the amplitude of the oscillation. You will notice that in this description the particles of water are made to vibrate across the line of propagation.

And now we have to take a step forward, and it is the most important step of all. You can picture two series of waves proceeding from different origins through the same water. When, for example, you throw a stone into still water, the ring waves proceeding from the two centres of disturbance intersect each other. Now, no matter how numerous these waves may be, the law holds good that the motion of every particle of the water is the algebraic sum of all the motions imparted to it. If crest coincide with crest, the wave is lifted to a double height; if furrow coincide with crest, the motions are in opposition, and their sum is zero. We have then still water, which we shall learn presently corresponds to in reference to our present subject. This action of wave upon wave is technically called interference, a term to be remembered.

Thomas Young's fundamental discovery in optics was that the principle of interference applied to light. Long prior to his time an Italian philosopher, Grimaldi, had stated that under certain circumstances two thin beams of light, each of which, acting singly, produced a luminous spot upon a white wall, when caused to act together, partially quenched each other and darkened the spot. This was a statement of fundamental significance, but it required the discoveries and the genius of Young to give it meaning. How he did so, I will now try to make clear to you. You know that air is compressible; that by pressure it can be rendered more dense, and that by dilatation it can be rendered more rare. Properly agitated, a tuning-fork now sounds in a manner audible to you all, and most of you know that the air through which the sound is passing is parcelled out into spaces in which the air is condensed, followed by other spaces in which the air is rarefied. These condensations and rarefactions constitute what we call waves of sound. You can imagine the air of a room traversed by a series of such waves, and you can imagine a second series sent through the same air, and so related to the first that condensation coincides with condensation and rarefaction with rarefaction. The consequence of this coincidence would be a louder sound than that produced by either system of waves taken singly. But you can also imagine a state of things where the condensations of the one system fall upon the rarefactions of the other. In this case the two systems would completely neutralize each other. Each of them taken singly produces sound; both of them taken together produce no sound. Thus, by adding sound to sound we produce silence, as Grimaldi in his experiment produced darkness by adding light to light.

LIGHT IS WAVE MOTION.

The possible analogy between sound and light here at once flashes upon the mind. Young generalized this observation. He discovered a multitude of similar cases, and determined their precise conditions. On the assumption that light was wave motion, all his experiments on interference were explained; on the assumption that light was flying particles, nothing was explained. In the time of Huyghens and Euler a medium had been assumed for the transmission of the waves of light; but Newton raised the objection that, if light consisted of the waves of such a medium, shadows could not exist. The waves, he contended, would bend round opaque bodies and produce the motion of light behind them, as sound turns a corner, or as waves of water wash round a rock. It was proved that the bending round referred to by Newton actually occurs, but that the inflected waves abolish each other by their mutual interference. Young also established a fundamental difference between the waves of light and those of sound. Could you see the air through which sound waves are passing, you would observe every individual particle of air

OSCILLATING TO AND FRO

In the direction of propagation. Could you see the ether you would also find every individual particle making a small excursion to and fro; but here the motion, like that of the water particles above referred to, would be across the line of propagation. The vibrations of the air are longitudinal, the vibrations of the ether are transversal.

It is my desire that you should realize with the utmost possible clearness the propagation of waves, both in ether and in air. And with this view I bring before you an experiment wherein the air particles are represented by small spots of light. These spots are parts of spirals drawn upon a circle of blackened glass, and when the circle is caused to rotate the spots move in successive pulses over the screen. You have here clearly set before you how the pulses travel incessantly forward, while the particles that compose them perform an oscillation to and fro. We have in this case the picture of a sound wave, in which the vibrations are longitudinal. By another arrangement of our glass wheel, we produce an image of a transverse wave, and here we observe the waves travelling in succession over the screen, while each individual spot of light performs an excursion to and fro across the line of propagation.

AN ILLUSTRATION FROM MUSIC.

The most familiar illustration of the interference of sound waves is furnished by the beats in music, which are produced by two musical sounds slightly out of unison. These two tuning forks are now in perfect unison, and when they are agitated together the two sounds flow without roughness, as if they were but one. But, by attaching to one of the forks a two-cent piece, we cause the loaded fork to vibrate a little more slowly than its neighbor. Suppose that one of them performs 101 vibrations in the same time as the other performs 100, and let us assume that at starting the condensations and rarefactions of both forks coincide. At the 101st vibration of the quickest fork they will again coincide, the quicker fork at this point having gained one vibration, or one whole wave upon the other. But a little reflection will make it clear that, at about the 50th vibration the two forks will be in opposition; here the one tends to produce a condensation where the other tends to produce a rarefaction; by the united action of the two forks, therefore, the sound is quenched, and we have a pause of silence. This occurs where one fork has gained half a wave length upon the other. At the 101st vibration we have again coincidence, and therefore augmented sound; at the 150th vibration we have again a quenching of the sound. Here the one fork is three half waves in advance of the other. With two forks so circumstanced we obtain those intermittent shocks of sound separated by pauses of silence, to which we give the name of beats (such beats were rendered audible to all in the lecture).

I now wish to show you what may be called the optical expression of those beats; and here we have to fall back upon the fact that a luminous impression persists for a certain interval upon the retina. Attached to a large tuning fork is a small mirror, which shares the vibrations of the fork, and on to the mirror is thrown a thin beam of light, which shares the vibrations of the mirror. The fork is now still, and the beam reflected from it is received upon a piece of looking-glass, and thrown back upon the screen, where it stamps itself as a small luminous disk. The agitation of the fork by a bow converts that disk into a band of light, and if you simply shake your heads to and fro you will be able to reduce that band to its elements; you draw it, in fact, out to a sinuous line, thus proving the periodic character of the motion which produces it. By a sweep of the looking-glass we can also cover the screen from side to side by this luminous scroll, the depth of the sinuosities indicating the amplitude of the vibration.

We now pass on the optical illustration of these beats. The large fork which we have just employed remains in its position; but instead of receiving the beam reflected from it on a piece of looking glass, it is received upon a second mirror attached to a second fork, and cast by it upon the screen. We now sound both forks, and both of them act in combination upon the beam. It is drawn out, as you see, as before, the band of light gradually shortening as the motion subsides. Finally, when the motion ceases, we obtain the disk of light. Weighting one of the forks as we did before with a two-cent piece, we throw it out of unison with the other, and now observe the screen. Sometimes the forks conspire, and then you have the band of light drawn out to its maximum length. Sometimes the forks oppose each other, and then you have the band of light diminished to a circle. Thus the beats which address the ear express themselves optically as the alternate elongation and shortening of the band of light. If I move the mirror of this second fork, you have a sinuous line, as before, drawn out upon the screen; but the sinuosities are sometimes deep, and sometimes they almost disappear, thus expressing the alternate increase and diminution of the sound, the intensity of which is expressed by the depth of the sinuosities.

THE VELOCITY OF LIGHT.

Every complete vibration of our tuning fork produces a wave of sound, and, as all sounds travel with the same velocity through air, the more rapid the vibration the shorter are the sound waves. The pitch of a sound is wholly determined by the rapidity of the vibration, as the intensity is by the amplitude. The rise of pitch with the rapidity of the impulses may be illustrated by the syren, which consists of a perforated disk rotating over a cylinder into which air is forced, and the end of which is also perforated. When the perforations of the disk coincide with those of the cylinder a puff escapes; and when the puffs succeed each other with sufficient rapidity the impressions upon the auditory nerve link themselves together to a continuous musical note. The more rapid the rotation of the disk the quicker is the succession of the impulses, and the higher the pitch of the note. Indeed, by means of the syren, the number of vibrations due to any musical note, whether it be that of an instrument, of the human voice, or of a flying insect, may be accurately determined.

In the undulatory theory, pitch is the analogue of color. The waves of light have been measured, and it is found that the more refrangible the light, the shorter are the waves which produce it. The shortest waves of the visible spectrum are those of the extreme violet; the longest, those of the extreme red; while the other colors are of intermediate pitch or wave length. The length of a wave of the extreme red is such that it would require 36,918 of them placed end to end to cover one inch, while 64,631 of the extreme violet waves would be required to span the same distance.

Now, the velocity of light, in round numbers, is 190,000 miles per second. Reducing this to inches, and multiplying the number thus found by 36,918, we obtain the number of waves of the extreme red in 190,000 miles. All these waves enter the eye, and hit the retina at the back of the eye in one second. The number of shocks per second necessary to the production of the impression of red is therefore four hundred and fifty-one millions of millions. In a similar manner it may be found that the number of shocks corresponding to the impression of violet is seven hundred and eighty-nine millions of millions. All space is filled with matter oscillating at such rates. From every star waves of these dimensions move with the velocity of light like spherical shells outward. And in the ether, just as in the water, the motion of every particle is the algebraic sum of all the separate motions imparted to it. Still, one motion does not blot the other out; or, if extinction occur at one point, it is made good at some other point. Every star declares by its light its own undamaged individuality, as if it alone had sent its thrills through space.

Mme. Amalie Joachim.

Mme. Clara Schumann and Mme. Amalie Joachim, friends in life and blood relations in art, have united for the purpose of giving concerts in Vienna. Both fair artists are valued old acquaintances of ours, though, it is true, in a different sense. The last time, and the last time but one, as well as at any time previous, that Mme. Schumann visited Vienna, she was already a most popular virtuosa; young "Clara Wieck" enjoyed great celebrity which subsequently, even from the name of Schumann, gained only greater significance and recognition, but not a higher character. Amalie Joachim, on the contrary, now appears for the first time in Vienna as an acknowledged vocal celebrity; we saw her, among ourselves, rise from very modest beginnings. As Mlle. Weiss, she was, on the completion of her fifteenth year, employed, or, more strictly speaking, not employed, for a time at the Kärntnerthor Theater, for the parts entrusted to her hardly ever rose higher than those of confidantes, and were calculated rather to retard than to forward any natural ability. I can still see her before me, with her young budding figure, her deep blue eyes, and her earnest bell-like voice, as she sang, in the character of a gipsy girl (in Rubinstein's Kinder der Heide), the marriage song, and beat the tambourine. A little performance, but pleasing both to eye and ear. The management, however, still hesitated in confiding to her more important things. As I look through my old theatrical notices, I find Fatima in Oberon is the greatest, nay, the only important, part which Mlle. Weiss sang here. In a criticism on Jemond (April, 1861), I see that the management is called upon to entrust Mlle. Weiss with Amazili, a sympathetic part, which, when presented in Mlle. Solzer's vocal aquafortis, threatened to burn her hearers. My proposal was disregarded; the management appeared to be merely deterred by the young artist's want of dramatic animation, and to overlook her good qualities. That the latter were valuable and capable of development, was very soon shown, when Mlle. Weiss—tired of watching over Norma's two children, or, for a change, Verdi's two Leonoras—went to Hanover, where her wings soon grew with greater dramatic efforts. All the Guelphs, leaders of tone, or leaders of ton, went raving about her, and "Er, der herrlichste von Allen" ("He, the grandest of them all") made her his wife. This happy marriage with Joseph Joachim fully matured what was still undeveloped in the lady's musical talent. No singer could have a better master than Joachim, or a more beautiful model for her singing than his violin playing. It is very certain that since then the lady's execution has caught much of the noble and sustained expression, the spirited treatment, and beautifully rounded form, which distinguish Joachim's playing. These qualities, combined with the deep and soft character of her voice, and the amiable repose of her disposition, pre-eminently fitted Mme. Joachim first for oratorio and then for the German Lied. In this sphere of art she has achieved a great reputation all over Germany, and carried off, at the first musical festivals, not many wreaths less than her lord and master with his violin.

That the brilliancy of Joachim's name has materially facilitated and smoothed her career need not on that account be denied; such a state of things is far more satisfactory than that when the process is reversed, and a man basks in the sunshine emanating from his wife. Thus, then, Mme. Joachim-Weiss came before us, after ten years' absence, as a person well-known, and yet a new acquaintance.

The pretty girl had grown into a stately and beautiful woman; the talented beginner had become a real artist. She was loudly applauded at the first concert, but pleased even far more at the second; a result quite in keeping with the nature of her talent, which does not dazzle or take her hearers by storm, but attracts them more and more, the better it is known, and eventually holds them spell-bound. We heard the lady sing very beautifully an air by Handel, Lieder by Schubert and Brahms, and, lastly, the first five pieces from Schumann's Frauenliebe und Leben. The last might, perhaps, be more agitated by passion, but no one can object to a calm, refined reading like that of Mme. Joachim, provided only it be subjectively true and full of feeling. The deepest impression was produced by the lady in the smaller songs, where the predominating features retire, as it were, behind a certain generality of feeling. Mme. Joachim had to repeat both.—Neue Berliner Musikzeitung.

"St. Paul" at St. Paul's.

By G. A. MACFARREN.

The oratorio is a development of an office of the primitive Western Church, which was preserved in the Reformed use established by Luther. This office, still periodically fulfilled in Rome, is the musical recital of the story of the Passion, at Eastertide, from one or other of the Gospels, in a semi-dramatic form; the object being to keep the sacred narrative alive in the memory of the faithful, and to render it most impressive by vitalizing the several persons who appear in the history, with an individual representative to deliver the words that each is recorded to have said.

In the middle of the sixteenth century, the application of this means of addressing a public was extended from the single, special, historic subject, to divers, various, and generally moral themes, and the performances instituted in the oratory by St. Filippo Neri were in a didactic form. Half a hundred years later, the musical works were distinctly dramas, which were represented in churches as the most effectual means of conveying religious and ethical instruction. In the seventeenth century the term "oratorio," as defining the relation of such works to the part of a church wherein they were given, was adopted by authors who furnished literary matter for the compositions in question, and it has become the distinctive art term by which they are described. The personification of abstract moral ideas gave place to the dramatization of incidents in sacred history, more frequently those of the old than of the new dispensation. The performance of oratorios was discontinued in churches and transferred to the theatres, where it was restricted for the most part to the season of Lent; and, in our times, Rossini, Donizetti, and Verdi have contributed to the number of these sacred lyrical dramas.

Such is, in brief, the progress of the oratorio in Italy, where however, desecrated as it has been by the style of its treatment and the locality of its performance, its ecclesiastical association is still maintained in the Passion recitals first named. In Germany, its relation to the Church has never been infringed; for, though oratorios are given as often as otherwise in concert rooms, this is with a view to the expediency of the occasion, and always with the idea of their being written for the Church, and appropriate to sacred buildings. It was Luther's express intention that the highest art means should illustrate the recitation of the Passion story at the Easter celebration, and successive musicians, accordingly, as the art advanced, exerted ever their utmost powers upon works for this purpose. Considerably later, other subjects were admitted into the scope of the oratorio; in the south, there has been far wider latitude in the arrangement of the form of these compositions, making it more dramatic and filling it more freely with non-scriptural poetry, than in the north; but the class of works has not there been appropriated to secular institutions.

In England, the very name of oratorio was unknown, until Handel produced a work of the class it defines. This was Esther, which was written during his abode at the mansion of the Duke of Chandos, in the summer of 1720, and it was privately performed there. It was nearly twelve years afterwards that it was first given in public. Its attraction then at the concert-room in Villiers Street, induced Handel himself to produce it at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket, and the performance of a sacred composition in a theatre was thus apologetically advertised: "N.B.—There will be no acting on the stage, but the house will be fitted up in a decent manner for the audience. The music to be disposed after the manner of the Coronation Service." The success of Esther established the "oratorio or sacred drama" as a department of art in which musicians might address the public with certainty of welcome according to their merit.

The performance of these works was given in theatres only—the King's, Lincoln's Inn Fields, and Covent Garden, but not without raising the scruples of serious people. To meet these, when the Messiah was reproduced here in 1743, after its success in Dublin, the name of the composition was withheld, as too holy for announcement in a playbill, and the work was advertised as "A Sacred Oratorio," this title referring to the nature of the subject, and not to the source of the text, since other oratorios similarly derived were not so distinguished. It was not till this masterpiece was given in the chapel of the Foundling Hospital, in 1750, under its original name, that it seems to have been duly accepted in London; whence the inference is, that, there needed ecclesiastical sanction to authorize the approbation of the holiest of themes to musical use, though its adoption in the other arts of poetry and painting had never been questioned. The same work was the first, out of the range of strictly Church music, that was included in the performances of the Three Choir Festivals; this was at Hereford, 1759, and its introduction there with others of its class, had been matter of discussion almost ever since, one earnest set of thinkers assuming that a church was an unfit arena for the most powerful and impressive setting forth of sacred subjects, in exact opposition to the arguments that had been urged against their presentation in secular edifices. The world at large accepts the oratorio as a class of work worthy to exercise the noblest genius, and capable of edifying the best cultivated public; a section of the public would exclude it from performance in theatres and concert rooms because of its too great sacredness for such localities; while another section would exclude it from churches, which locality they advance as being too sacred for such works. This is an anomaly, which, to have prevailed at all, has prevailed too long; and it is cause for solicitation to earnest thinkers, that the time seems to be at hand for disregarding, if not abolishing, such inconsistency.

Besides these contrarieties and contradictions in public views as to the destination of the oratorio, the Church of England itself, or its authorities, have had wide fluctuations in their general estimation of music in reference to Church use, even as an element of the daily ritual. In old times, in places where the means were competent, it was the custom to employ the highest available resources of the art in the Church's service. So, in the Chapel Royal, there was always a full band, the members of which were styled "Gentlemen" of the institution, the instrumentalists having this appellation in common with the singers. There is ample evidence of this, as well in the cheque-books and like documents, as in pictorial representations of the chapel with the full band discharging its functions. In St. Paul's Cathedral, again, though no instrumental band was comprised in the establishment, it was usual to have one on special occasions; at the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy, for instance, Purcell's Te Deum was annually performed with complete orchestral requirements, from almost the time of the opening of the new cathedral, until 1743, when the setting of the hymn by Handel, in celebration of the battle of Dettingen, was produced, and in the following year this work was substituted for Purcell's, and it was given at the recurrence of the Festival every year for nearly a century. It was early in the fifth decade of the present hundred years that this long standing usage was discontinued. The Church authorities, I am assured, came then to the most strange, since totally unaccountable conclusion, that instruments of the viol class were profane, were of worldly and fleshly, if not diabolical suggestion, and were thus inapt for use within sacred precincts. I (pardon the personality) am assured too that the Times newspaper supported this extraordinary tenet; and hence it must be admitted that, within and without the circle of the church, it was entertained by those who could think seriously, if perhaps not wisely. Under the ordainment of these authorities, the yearly orchestra which the Royal Society of Musicians furnish for the benefit of their fellow charity the Sons of the Clergy, was disallowed to perform in the Metropolitan Church; under their ordainment, the instruments employed to solemnize the Burial Service of the Duke of Wellington, in 1852, were those only which constitute the German bands, which annoy some and, let us hope, delight others at our street corners; and for these cornets and clarionets, and the like, in addition to the organ, Sir John Goss had to compose his funeral music; and under their ordainment also, for the Sons of the Clergy Bicentenary Festival in 1854, the same distinguished musician was limited to the same means in the composition of his anthem. Any other occasion may serve to discuss the relation of violins and theology, military instruments and Church rites; let it however here be protested on art grounds, that nothing could be more inconsistent than the combination of wind instruments, each of them expressing the will and feeling of the player, with that multitudinous wind instrument whose tone is inflexible to the player's control, and which is an aggregate of imitations of the specialties of all the brass and reed instruments. On another occasion these same authorities relaxed their rigor against bows and strings, and permitted not only their presence within the hallowed aisles, but the performance of an oratorio intact, a sacred oratorio, that very Messiah which was in some sort unrecognized before it was given in a sacred building, and had since been deemed inappropriate to such a site. This was in 1861, when it was desirable to raise funds to defray the cost of the great organ of Messrs. Hill and Son, lately purchased from the Panopticon, and to help towards the decoration of the church, and the Feast of St. Paul was celebrated by a performance of this work by a band of some seventy, and chorus of very far larger number, and the most popular solo vocalists of the day. Sir John Goss, in his capacity of Cathedral Organist, presided over this, which, in spite of myriad obstacles, was artistically a successful performance. Had it been fiscally so, one may suppose it might not have been the sole occasion of holding a musical festival in honor of the Feast of St. Paul, in the building dedicated to him. It was first intended that, most fitly, Mendelssohn's oratorio which depicts the character and career of the Apostle, should have been the work to celebrate his Conversion; but the comparatively better knowledge of the other oratorio among the executants was expected to ensure a proportionately better performance, while its comparatively better knowledge among the public was expected to ensure a proportionately better attendance. They who were present concur in expressions of marvel at the wondrous effects of the combined elements of sound on this occasion in that stupendous medium of sonority, and there needs be no strain of imagination for every one to feel that they must have been indeed sublime. The pecuniary results have not been made public. Is the sale of guinea and half-guinea tickets the just gauge of such an undertaking's value, or are heart impressions and trains of thought, the one that may flow on for a lifetime, the other that may be indelible?

The admission in England of the oratorio to what is elsewhere its natural home, the church—and admission as a lawful child, rather than as a foundling, if it ever obtain general recognition, will date from the performance of Bach's Passion, at Eastertide, in Westminster Abbey, in 1871. The pretext of benefiting a charity, which, as an apology for oratorio performances, has too long equivocated and therefore damaged the question of their propriety within ecclesiastical walls, was not then set up in its justification; neither was that of raising money for Church uses. It was deemed that here, as in other lands, the teaching of sacred history on the anniversaries of its chief events, would be enforced by the appropriating of the highest of art accessories to its elucidation. The great and devout work of the great and devout master, which illustrates the Passion after the old Roman wise which Luther preserved, but boundlessly surpasses in excellence every other endeavor to do justice to this hallowed purpose, was given in our Abbey with an effect that cannot pass away. It constituted a Special Service, all who attended which must have experienced a special influence, and this influence can only have been for the highest good. The Abbey performance was repeated at the due season in 1872; and the example of the Dean and Chapter was adopted in some smaller institutions, where Handel's Passion and his Messiah were given, less completely perhaps, but with the same purpose of elevating public feeling to the level of the great commemoration. In like manner to the Abbey, these churches opened their performance freely to the public; and though the zeal of diversely thinking parties led them violently to reprobate the employment of this means of religious instruction, there are reasons to believe that the experiment—for as yet it can only be accounted as such—was successful, and reasons to wish for the permanence of the practice.

In the same spirit and with corresponding means, the Conversion of St. Paul is to be celebrated on the coming 25th of January, in our Cathedral. This is not to be a Special Service, but the ordinary performance of Evensong with a capious selection from Mendelssohn's Oratorio to constitute the anthem. As well as this eminently suitable manner of celebrating the day, there will be an appropriate sermon. Else everything will proceed as at the usual Evening service at 4 o'clock, the public will be freely admitted, and there will be no offertory. To give effect to the music—anthem, let it be called—the choir will be amplified to the extent of 60 or 70 boys and men, and be supported by a band of about 40. These will occupy the usual locality of the singers at the Daily Service, which will be enlarged to accommodate them. The solos will be sustained by members of the Cathedral choir, boys and men, the auxiliaries of which, all professional, will only assist as chorus. The whole of the musical functionaries will be identified with the ecclesiastical duties of the day, by being vested in surplices, which, for the players, will have the sleeves so looped up as to leave freedom to the arms and hands. The objectors to musical festivals in churches have made a point, which is assumed to be a strong one, of the profanity of exercising a carpenter's calling within the hallowed precincts; accordingly, it is expressly stipulated in the provisions for the coming occasion, that sounding of hammer and piercing of nail shall not take place in the building; so, as the desks will not be erected by miracle, all joiner's work for their preparation will be performed outside. The suggestion of this great measure—great as a vigorous step in the onward progress of the times, great as a method of instructing and refining the public by means of an art which almost shares the sacredness of religion—is due entirely to the new organist, Dr. Stainer. On him rests also the responsibility of the entire arrangements, which must be entangled enough to engross all his thoughts, as will that of conducting the performance. It is his own avowal that he receives the most cordial support of the Dean and Chapter, which is highly to their credit; it is not everybody of this nature that appreciates an officer who can devise what is as much for the advantage of their institution as for the benefit of the public, and in admiring the confidence of the ruling body, a commendation is expressed of him in whom they worthily confide.

The duration of the extended anthem may not, it seems, exceed some three quarters of an hour. Great ingenuity was needed then, in the selection of such portions of the oratorio as would present the most salient features of St. Paul's character and works, and yet come within the closely limited space of time, and such ingenuity has been well exercised. The compilation shows the Apostle, first, as experiencing his conversion, second, as preaching the gospel, and third, as suffering for the truth's sake and as being glorified for his works on earth to prepare men for heaven.

The first section will begin with the Tenor Recitative, "And as he journeyed," including the presentation of the miracle of the arrest of Saul, in his course of persecution, by the voice from heaven. The Chorus, the finest, grandest and most impressive in the work, "Rise up and shine," will follow. Then the Choral "Sleepers, wake," which is most important to the selection, as being in fact the motto of the oratorio, the words of the first stanza being inscribed upon the title-page, and the music of the three lines being the main feature of the overture; and again, as being a particular comment on the preceding chorus, which in itself especially celebrates the awakening of man from the gross darkness of ignorance to the light of truth. The fine tune of this Choral is ascribed to the year 1599, so that, in its present form, it dates not to the time of the author of the Reformation; but it is obviously an adaptation of a far earlier ecclesiastical melody, and thus its phrases cannot have been unknown to Luther, and whoever penned the hymn must have been imbued with his spirit. It has often been said that Mendelssohn was in some degree indebted to an earlier work for his bright graphic thought of employing brass instruments, with their majestic summons that might awaken a sleeping world from the lethargy of ages, for the interludes between the several lines of this tune.

The work referred to is the production of a most diffident anonymous amateur, an oratorio of small merit which was published at Hamburg, in 1778, under the title of The Disciple at Emmaus. Among many other Chorals, this tune truly occurs therein to the 2d verse of the hymn, "Jesus Christ ist wieder kommen," and it stands in the same key of D in which the author of St. Paul has set it; but the rhythmic arrangement of the notes is remarkably different. There are parts moreover in the score for two horns and one trumpet, but these are quite subordinate to those for the violins, hautboys, and basses, which stand above and below them; hence, to put an end to the allegation, it is clear that if the idea of the trumpet interludes be taken from this piece, he who took it must have doubly tasked his invention in setting aside the old thought to make way for his original, brilliant and poetical conception. In due succession, the Recitative "And his companions," and the great typical Air, "Oh God have mercy," will next come; to be followed by the Recitative, "And there was a disciple," and the Air with Chorus, "I praise Thee, O Lord," which may be regarded as Saul's apprehension of the grace that was awaiting him in his coming baptism, and as the encouraging voice of his newly awakened conscience.

The Recitative will ensue "And Ananias went his way," and the final Chorus of the First Part, "Oh, great is the depth," which completes this famous scene of the Conversion.

The second section will comprise the Recitative "And Paul came," showing how St. Paul was called to his apostleship; the duet for Paul and Barnabas, "Now we are ambassadors," which, in its gentle earnestness, bespeaks the meek and loving spirit of the holy men who went forth to preach Jesus to the world; and the Chorus, "How lovely are the messengers" in which the beauty of their mission, more than its labors and cares, is sweetly represented.

The third section of these cleverly chosen pieces will begin with the Recitative, "And they all persecuted Paul," with the ensuing Air for tenor accompanied by the violoncello, "Be thou faithful." After this, the Recitative, "And Paul sent," in which the Apostle takes leave of the Ephesians, and the Quartet with chorus "Far be it," wherein, the weeping congregation utter their regrets for him whose lessons of love to one another have peculiarly drawn their affections to himself. The Chorus, "See what love," will follow,—a reflection on Paul's labors and their result, picturing the peace of mind which rewards the steadfast pursuit of a high purpose. Lastly, there will be the conclusion of the narrative in the Recitative "And though he be offered," which introduces the Chorus, "Not only unto him" that terminates the oratorio.

This epitome of Mendelssohn's work has a sort of completeness, which will make it eminently interesting and perfectly suitable to the occasion. An oratorio will thus, for the first time in England, be integrated in the Church Service, and it will be wonderful if, in this position, invested with all the associations of the place and the time, of the season that is illustrated, and of the solemnity to which it will be made incidental, the effect of the music be not deeply penetrating. It would be vain to attempt to foretell the issue of what can but be regarded as an experiment; still it may be hoped that in restoring thus the English Church Service to the grandeur of long bygone times, very much may be added to its attractiveness, and, what is of far loftier importance, very much indeed to its impressiveness.

Here may be stated, as bearing on the question of the presentation of oratorios in church, that it is designed to celebrate the approach of Easter, in 1873, at St. Anne's Church, Soho, with a series of performances, on the Friday evenings throughout Lent, of Bach's setting of the Passion as narrated in the Gospel of St. John. They will be under the direction of Mr. Barnby, the instigator and conductor of the Abbey performances of the Matthew Passion. Such a course as this cannot be ineffective in preparing the minds and hearts of visitants for the solemnity of the coming season, in preparing them to estimate the sorrows that were borne for man, and in vivifying the historic lesson which the Church then teaches.

Music has been mainly considered but as a decoration at most, wholly dispensable if not quite redundant, of the Church's Service; it may now be proved to be an essential element of the Service itself. The change may work much for art in giving musicians an object and a responsibility far beyond any they have at present; it may work more for religion, in bringing multitudes who would else be careless of them to receive its lessons, and in addressing these lessons to the living feelings of auditors instead of to their cold understanding. Church authorities may be slow to acknowledge that this great change, if it come about, was due to men of another calling, but their acknowledgment is not needed. The world will be indebted to Mr. Barnby and Dr. Stainer, and such other artists as may aid them in the fulfilment of their difficult self-imposed task, for any good that may spring from the adoption of Oratorios in Church.—*Lon. Musical Correspondence.

New York, Jan. 20.—Rubinstein and Wieniawski have said farewell to us and we shall hear them no more until next Spring, when they will return from their Western tour. The last concerts took place at the Academy of Music on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, Jan. 8th and 9th. The programme of the first was as follows:

Overture to "Oberon".....Weber.
Concerto, No. 2, F major.....Rubinstein.
Anton Rubinstein.

Violin Concerto.....Mendelssohn.
H. Wieniawski.
Vorspiel: "Lohengrin".....Wagner.
a. Sonata.....Beethoven.
b. Katzenfuge.....Scarlatti.
Anton Rubinstein.
Fantaisie, "Il Pirata".....Ernst.
H. Wieniawski.
Schubert's Hungarian March.....Liszt.

The Beethoven Sonata was the one in C-sharp minor, No. 14, commonly called "Moonlight," and the Violin Concerto that in E minor. Rubinstein played with his customary power, and, being recalled after the Cat's Fugue, gave his famous arrangement of the march from "The Ruins of Athens." As for the orchestra, I need only say that it was that of Theodore Thomas!

At the second concert Rubinstein played Mozart's D minor Concerto, and several other pieces. On Monday last the great pianist gave his matinée d'adieu, at which he played no less than fourteen selections, including four of Schumann's pieces, four arrangements by Liszt, Mendelssohn's Wedding March, Beethoven's Turkish March, a Beethoven Sonata, the overture to Egmont, and a Nocturne and Scherzo of his own.

On Saturday evening, Jan. 11, came the third of the Thomas Symphony Soirées, which are now generally regarded as the best of our musical entertainments. Mr. Thomas offered us:

Symphony, G minor.....Mozart.
Concerto, No. 4, G. op. 58.....Beethoven.
Mr. Anton Rubinstein.
Overture, "Manfred".....Schumann.
a. Fantaisie, }
b. Etudes }.....Chopin.
Symphonic Poem: "Hungaria".....Liszt.

Mr. Thomas combines a perfect repose of manner with all the qualities essential to a leader, and throughout the symphony all the crescendos, diminuendos, and fine gradations of light and shade were accomplished, apparently, without effort on the part of either conductor or orchestra. As this was Rubinstein's very last appearance in New York for the present, his performance naturally attracted an unusual degree of attention. As we come to know him better we find that we can never tell just how he is going to play, even if it is a piece which we have heard him render half a score of times. Usually, however, it is only a variation in degrees of excellence, and we are willing that our curiosity should be piqued at the beginning.

He played the Concerto magnificently, more than realizing all that we could have expected; but, I regret to say he marred and defaced that noble composition by the introduction of cadenzas in a style utterly at variance from the spirit of the work or the composer. Of course there is not the slightest objection to his executing an Indian war dance on the piano, if he chooses to do so; but, when he introduces one into the middle of a Beethoven Concerto it is time to remonstrate. The Chopin Fantaisie (op. 49), was finely rendered, and the first of the Etudes, the lovely one in E major (op. 10), was given with all the accuracy, all the clearness, all the ideal pathos and passion with which Chopin himself might have played it. The second Etude, that in C minor, was played with an utter disregard of any rhythm, and a general mixing up of notes which was quite unnecessary, and which seemed almost like affectation on the part of the performer.

The fourth Symphony concert will take place on Saturday evening, Feb. 1st, when Schumann's E-flat Symphony will be performed, and Anna Mehlig will play Chopin's Second Concerto.

This brings me to the third Philharmonic concert, which came on Saturday evening, Jan. 18th. It opened with Weber's Overture to Oberon, a piece just good enough to be enjoyed without requiring any sustained attention. Then came Mr. S. B. Mills, the pianist of the evening, and of course he played Chopin's Second Concerto, which is the regular thing for him to do. He rendered the entire work with extraordinary delicacy and precision, and, I think I may say, with patience considering the badness of the orchestral accompaniment, which must have been torture to him. In spite of this drawback his treatment of the work, and especially of the famous Adagio, was such as to gain the applause alike of critics and connoisseurs. The next piece was the Hirtengesang (for Orchestra) from Liszt's new Oratorium "Christus," concerning which the less is said the better.

Mme. CAMILLA Urso followed with Mozart's Concerto for the Violin in D, opus 121. This lady has no laurels to win here, as there are few violinists among the many who have visited New York, who are as well known and as highly esteemed as she. I have heard no violin playing, since Sarasate left us, which satisfied me so thoroughly as hers. She is the soul of Poetry, and the tone she draws from her instrument is of marvelous sweetness. If everything necessary to perfection could be combined in one player, I should desire her bowing to be stronger; but that, with her, is a physical impossibility.

The second part of the programme was entirely occupied by Schumann's magnificent Symphony in C, which some people (and their number is increasing yearly) think is the greatest ever written. I am content to consider its positive rather than its relative grandeur, and wish I could praise the rendering as highly as I can the work itself. Truth, however, compels me to state that it was indifferently played, and many of the most beautiful passages were so rendered as to be scarcely intelligible.

In my last letter I had not space enough to mention the fourth, and last, of the series of Soirées at Steinway's, by Messrs. MILLS and DAMROSCH, (Jan. 2.) The programme included a Sonata for Piano and Violin, (E flat,) by Mozart. A Sonata for Violin, with piano accompaniment, (G minor,) by Giuseppe Tartini, and Schumann's Second Trio, F major, opus 80, played by Messrs. Mills, Damrosch and Bergner. Mr. Mills played a Melodie "Reproach" in D flat, by F. Brandies, Chopin's "Berceuse" and the Tarantelle in A flat, op. 43, by the same composer.

The ONSLOW QUARTETTE CLUB, now in their second season, have begun a series of Classical Concerts at De Gaimo Hall. At the first concert, Jan. 8, Rubenstein's Quartet in F, and a Quintet in G minor, by F. Zitterbart, were performed.

The BROOKLYN PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY have in Rehearsal for their next concert (Feb. 8.) Bristow's "Arcadian Symphony," and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer-night's Dream" music.

BOSTON, JAN. 25, 1873.

Concerts.

We are behindhand in our fortnightly review, and must begin as far back as Jan. 8d and 6th, with the fine concert of the APOLLO CLUB, given twice over in the great Music Hall, that all the friends of active and associate members might have an opportunity to hear. And a most eager interest was manifested upon both occasions. Never in this city have we heard so capital a chorus of male singers; the voices being of the choicest quality in all the four parts,—particularly the smooth, sweet, clearly soaring upper tenors and the rich, mellow, manly basses,—and their ensemble very perfect under the careful training and the sure and nice conductorship of Mr. B. J. LANG. They number nearly a dozen voices of each part, filling the great hall singularly well for so small but compact a crowd, and their whole performance was obviously a marked improvement upon that of a year ago, good as that then seemed to most of us.

The programme was the same for both evenings, except that there was an orchestra the second time, for certain accompaniments and Overtures, which could not be procured the first time. The first part began with Beethoven's fiery Coriolanus Overture, given with great spirit by the orchestra, not ineffectively foreshadowed on the first night by an arrangement for two Chickering pianos played by Mr. LANG and his pupils Messrs. SUMNER, APTHORP and TUCKER. Then followed three of the more classical order of male part-songs (of which the repertoire cannot be very large): "The Cheerful Wanderer," by Mendelssohn; "The Night," by Schubert, full of "heaven-like peace" and "stars in solemn measure;" and a "Rhine Wine Song" by Robert Franz. The first two were beautifully sung; the third, as original and fine a composition of its kind as either of them, but very spirited and soaring, ringing with a storm of rapid echoes, trying to voice and breath, and withal perhaps too local in its theme, too German in its words, for those who sing in English, showed more of conscious effort and hardly seemed to pass at its full worth. The enthusiasm of the audience was reserved for the sweet, sentimental melody of Abt, which followed: "A May Night;" of course they were taken by the bit of tenor solo at the end of each stanza: "Oh night, thou holy, silent night," which was indeed sung most musically, in tones sweet and strong and finely shaded, with pure and finished style, and with a chaste fervor, by Dr. LANGMAID. Both evenings this had to be repeated. And so had Kücken's "On the Rhine," with its invocation to the Loreley, for Bass and Tenor solo, in which the deep full tones and the mature style of Mr. WETTERBEE, and the singularly fresh and beautiful tenor of Mr. CHENERY, so individual in its timbre, caused great delight.

The first part closed with Beethoven's "Chorus of Dervishes," one of the most signal instances of the composer's imaginative faculty of conjuring up, by the mere spell of tones and rhythm, scenes he had never visited. With the whirling orchestral accompaniment, the wild shouts of "Kaaba!", and the short relentless fits of minor melody, it summons before us with a terrible vividness, yet with a strange fascination, all the fanatical fever and barbaric fury of the Mahomedan devotees and the ruins of old Greece. It was executed to a charm, and the "Turkish March" succeeded aply, when there was an orchestra, receding decreasing in the distance, to complete the scene. This one selection, to our feeling, is worth a thousand part-songs for male voices any time.

Part II. opened with "The Fair Melusina" Overture, charmingly rendered by full orchestra, and not indistinctly sketched in the eight-hand performance. "The Woodland Rose," by Fischer, was a sweet and gentle strain of nicely blended harmony. Hatton's "Tars' Song," a very clever, breezy composition of its kind, went "cheerily" enough, the leading tenor ringing out bravely on his high C's. Another English song, by Arthur Sullivan, for triple quartet: "The long day closes," of a serene and serious character, pleased very much. And now it was well to break the monotony of part-songs by something larger, grander; and the superb double chorus, in praise of Bacchus, from Mendelssohn's Antigone, was given with full orchestra, with crisp precision and a right buoyant and inspiring energy; if it was not as loudly applauded as the sentimental sweets of Abt and Kücken with their bits of solo, we cannot think that it was less enjoyed. Would it not be a noble task, and quite within the means of the Apollo Club, to bring out some day all of the "Antigone" music? Mere part-song singing (at least without mixed voices) finds its limit sooner than one anticipates, and will inevitably become monotonous after the first hour, however perfect in its way. Quite happily, however, was the programme relieved this time by larger things, while the part songs were in the main discreetly chosen both "quantitatively and qualitatively," if we may use such metaphysical jargon. An "Evening Song," by Naater, followed, and the concert closed with the bibulous German's aspiration that he might be a whale in an Atlantic ocean of "Champagne";—innocent enough in music!

We heartily congratulate the "Apollo" on its great success so far, and look forward with interest to its next tuneful invitation.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The fifth of the series (Jan. 9) had a fine audience, and though the programme offered little of the grandly exciting, or of the extraordinary, it gave real pleasure and won approbation,—possibly not entirely unanimous.

Overture to "Coriolanus"..... Beethoven.
Pianoforte Concerto, No. 3, in G minor, op. 58. Moscheles.

J. C. D. Parker.
Overture to "Les Abencerrages"..... Cherubini.

Concerto for the Oboe, in F minor..... Rietz.

August Kutzleb.
Symphony, No. 8, in C major (second time)...Mozart.

The Coriolanus Overture is as grand, however, and as exciting, with as lovely a relief of tenderness and pathos, as any orchestral work we know of in so short a form. It went well and made the deep impression that it always does; it bears the stamp divine of true, transcendent genius. The Overture to Cherubini's opera Les Abencerrages, which takes its subject from the reconquest of Grenada from the Moors,—its name reminding many of us of one of our first French class books, "Gonsalve de Cordova" by flowery Florian,—is one of the most spirited and brilliant of his masterworks in that form. It is largely scored, and has a stately martial ring in the opening and closing movement, with middle passages of bright, fresh melody and delicate, ingenious contrapuntal finesse, very charming, but not so very easy of execution; this part of it was blurred a little, but, as a whole, the overture proved its right to be heard much oftener than it has been here, this being only the second time in Boston, if we mistake not.

As compositions, the two solos are not highly stimulating, though good in their way, especially the G-minor Concerto by Moscheles, a work of sterling excellence and graceful, learned, genial musicianship, which surely it was no excess of piety to hold up in the light a second time in a city where all the dozen great piano concertos have become as familiar as household words, while a work of such old and high repute as this had never once been heard in public here until two years ago. Mr. PARKER made a good mark for himself by his remarkably clean, distinct, refined, artistic rendering of all three movements. He has the rare virtue of a perfectly firm and even tempo always, yet without stiffness; it was all easy, elegant and winning. If he has not the strength or the electric power of some pianists, he yet proved himself entirely adequate to so difficult and classical a task. Mr. KUTZLER's pure, rich tone and uncommonly clean and facile execution on that most difficult of reed instruments, the Oboe, won general recognition. We do not think Rietz's composition one particularly interesting, though it has artistic merit, but there is some fine serious Cantabile in the Adagio, and the Intermezzo pleases by its pastoral quaintness. But that delicious Mozart Symphony in C,—not the great "Jupiter," but the one that was heard here for the first time last winter—would have made amends for a long stretch of dullness. Quiet as it is, it is full of the unfailing Mozart charm in every part of it; you feel that you are safe and close to the very heart of music while you listen to such strains, and your content is in proportion to the completeness with which you yield your whole attention to it, which ought not, one would think, to cost much effort of the will.

MME. RUDERSDORFF's second Matinee at Mechanics' Hall, on Tuesday, drew a much larger audience than the first, and musically was a great success. The programme was unique and very choice, and the performance generally gave great delight. Details hereafter.—The third and last Matinee will come on Tuesday, Feb. 4.

The programme of the sixth SYMPHONY CONCERT has been unavoidably somewhat altered. It now consists of: Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony [quite short]; Beethoven's 2nd piano Concerto [in B flat], played by Mr. LANG; Overture to "Preciosa," Weber; Schumann's Concertstück for piano [first time], Mr. LANG; and "Ocean" Symphony by Rubinstein.

Italian Opera.—Pauline Lucca.

Everybody must have been surprised to see every body else at the Boston Theatre on the first Lucca night, in spite of the high prices, and in a period when everybody felt poor and so many had been turning a deaf ear to the best appeals of art and of refined amusement. Still more surprising has it been to see the crowded houses kept up nearly all the time now for three weeks, the only exceptions being on the few nights when Miss KELLOGG was the star, singing of course admirably, but in such hacknied mere sensation pieces as the "Trovatore" and the "Traviata." Non ragionam di loro. And all the more surprising in consideration of the very poor reports preceding the arrival of this company from New York and Philadelphia. It seems to have come to this: that people now are drawn to Opera mainly by the curiosity to see and hear one famous lyrical person, one new star that had not risen yet upon our hemisphere, caring comparatively little for the music in itself, or for any music unless coupled with scenic show and action; and for the rest, because opera-going is one of the pastimes supposed to be fashionable; for fashion, we know, fancies itself more excellent than any art or music, and the more expensive a thing is, the more its votaries feel it their distinguished duty to support it. The fact is, an opera crowd is seldom what can properly be called a musical crowd.

We get no longer any good wholes in Opera. We learn to be contented with a very poor ensemble, or patiently accept it as inevitable, if that be the condition of our witnessing the reigning star at all.

We did get better operatic wholes in our first days of opera, when those Havana troupes were here, and when it was entirely Italian, although the repertoire has been enriched since opera became more polyglottic. But in the character of performance there has been a steady process of deterioration ever since. We presume nothing but a permanent establishment, for which democracy is not yet ready, can ever give us excellent and complete opera. The flying visits we now get from troupes made up for speculative purposes, and with the hope of reaping great golden profits in the shortest time and in the cheapest way, of course are governed by a very different economy from that which regulates a permanent good opera. The impresarios tell us that we cannot have it otherwise; that they must pay the leading artists double their European price to induce them to cross the ocean and take the risks of a strange climate and the perpetual wear and tear of singing every night and travelling from State to State; that they must pay for a first-class opera house, say our Boston Theatre, as much rent per night as they would pay for a whole week at Covent Garden, with two hundred of the best (stockholders') seats taken out and sold against them; with three or four times the expense for advertising that they would have in Europe; and that for all this the economy must fall on chorus, orchestra, subordinate parts, and all that goes to make up the perfect ensemble which seems now past hope with us. They even declare that such a theatre (the "Boston") crammed every night at highest prices would not cover the expense of a complete and thoroughly appointed Opera. There is nevertheless a pretty general suspicion that these speculative enterprisers, who return so steadily to the attack, do bear away great sums of money for their own share, as well as the great soprano or tenore.

How this may be we know not, but it is certain that the managers can be taken at their word when they admit that the ensembles as a rule are bad. The present company is no exception. It has one star of genius, a great artist in her way; one other prima donna, who uniformly sings well and possesses many attractions, though in no sense great,—Miss KELLOGG; a good basso in M. JAMET; all the rest indifferent or old; a chorus that screams discordantly through Faust and labors out of breath in the Huguenots; an orchestra, not poor in material by any means, but half the time marring the music through the lack of fair rehearsal; and the consequence is that we never heard a worse performance of an opera as a whole than that presented of the Huguenots the other night, and never imagined that the exquisite music of Mozart's Le Nozze could be made to seem so long and so monotonous. Such lighter things as Fra Diavolo went better.

The real charm, the reconciler of the audiences to these short-comings, has been Mme. LUCCA. She does not disappoint, she brings a positive, fresh individuality, an intense dramatic fervor, which kindles naturally and is not forced, great versatility and spontaneity in her impersonations, which all show insight and consistency; graces of person and of movement; a musical nature, and a voice large and adequate, of a free vibrating quality, sympathetic, musical, admirably trained, to all her tasks. The charm is singular, infallible. Yet she does not seem one of the fine, ideal natures; there is little of the spiritual, romantic, mystical element in the impression she produces. Her art is wholly realistic: there is the strongest contrast between such a nature and that of Nilsson. Her grandest triumphs are in the last scene of La Favorita; the great duet in the third act of Les Huguenots, where she even inspired the tenor, VIZZANI, with an unwonted life; and her Margaret in Faust. The first is at best a gloomy opera, and much of its music coarse and meaningless; but it affords great scope for passion, into which the little actress with the great conception, the little singer with the great voice throws herself with whole-souled, thrilling energy. Never, in voice or action, have we felt the crushing weight, the utter prostration of despair more fully embodied, nor the transfiguring power of joy when the despairing lovers meet and own their love again after both have renounced the world. With Lucca, not only is there sudden sunshine, bird-like rapture in her tones, not only is her face radiant, but her whole body appears full of light. Her Margaret is not of the ideal Nilsson type, not the refined lady in an humble guise, but just a simple, pious, charming, loving peasant girl. She is short and brusque with Faust in declining his first salutation. She is nature itself in the spinning wheel scene and the "King of Thule" ballad, where both the song and the thinking aloud are musically perfect. She is completely girlish in her fondling by-play with the jewels. Her agonies of remorse in the church scene, where, on her knees, with her back to the audience all the time, she strives to pray, turning the leaves of her prayer-book convulsively as if to find some prayer, some holy spell more fit for guilt like her's, are positively painful, so intensely real that many think it overdone. (Why do they always in this scene present the "Evil Spirit" in the same form and garb he wears disguised as Mephistopheles? This robs the scene of all its spiritual terror, and makes it melo-dramatic and absurd. The "Evil Spirit" here should be a far more shadowy, unearthly, superhuman presence, and not the tempter she has met before in human form and felt a strange antipathy). In the prison scene she is equally realistic; but here, as in all such climaxes, by the very intensity of feeling, by her complete abandon, she becomes poetic and imaginative. Nilsson is always poetic; Lucca takes Goethe literally; Nilsson is Gounod's Gretchen.

In her lighter characters we find the same realism. In Don Giovanni, her Zerlina has been well styled "bucolic;" it is literally conformed to the Abbe Du Ponte's text and story; but not to Mozart's music, which reveals an inner finer nature in the rustic girl. "Lucca is Zerlina," it is said. But which is most important, the Abbe's poor and somewhat vulgar play, or Mozart's most ideal music. Mozart in his Zerlina melodiously idealizes the passion that is master of us all, reveals the divine quality of love, which lifts the peasant to a level with the queen. Mme. Bosio's Zerlina had this quality; she to our mind must evermore remain the ideal Zerlina. Yet Lucca's Zerlina was a consistent whole, most perfect in its way. Both song and action in La ci darem, with SIG. MORIAMI, who made a passable Don Juan, in Batti, batti, &c., was admirably natural and charming—only not ideal. In Auber's Zerlina (Fra Diavolo) she was all that one could wish, surpassing any we have seen before.

It must not be thought that we dismiss all the other artists of this troupe as not worth mention. Had we room for detail, we might speak of uniform excellence in JAMET's singing and impersonations, though he has not the weight and force for the old Huguenot soldier, Marcel. VIZZANI, the principal tenor, has a handsome figure and a sweet voice, which in some scenes he has used to good advantage, though he is generally weak. SIG. ABRUGNEDO, the tenor in La Favorita, [the only time that we have heard him], seemed to labor hard, but sang "Spirto gentil" very acceptably. Signor SPARAFANI, baritone, lacks dignity, yet more than once has sung his way into good favor. The minor characters have been most feebly represented, if we except Mr. LYELL, tenor. Signora LAVIELLE sang quite well in much of Donna Elvira's music, but as the Countess in Figaro she was often out of tune and stiff in action. Mlle. SANZ looks the boy parts well, sang the first song of the Page well in the Huguenots, but has seemed most of the time not to be in full possession of her voice. Miss KELLOGG more than once has shared the honors with Mme. LUCCA, although it is not in her voice or nature to make a very deep impression. Her Susanna in Figaro was charming, and she sang Deh vieni exquisitely. Indeed she is one of the most sure, correct, true, facile, finished singers now upon the stage; and her obliging cheerful manner, her willingness to sacrifice herself and try to sing so arduous a part as Donna Anna, when she was evidently sick and almost without voice, rather than not have the play go on, have won for her much grateful recognition.

LATER.—We have seen Mignon! and can only now say that it was by far the best performance of the season: good as a whole for once. Lucca is Mignon verily!

WORCESTER, MASS.—The Palladium, Jan. 8, speaks of a concert given by Miss ANTOINETTE STERLING, and of her "magnetic power" over a "large and appreciative audience."

She was assisted by Miss Therese Liebe, the violinist of the Rudersdorff Troupe, and The Orpheus Society of Springfield; with Mr. B. D. Allen as accompanist. Miss Sterling's magnificent voice was shown to great advantage in an Aria by Salvatore Rosa, (1615-1673.) Recitative and Aria from Handel's "Xerxes," "The Tomb of the Heroes" by Liszt, the "Secret" by Schubert, "The Enchantress of the Forest" by Rubinstein, and an Old English Ballad written in 1550; with encore selections. The Handel aria evinced her ability to perform oratorio music, and the various songs, which were all of a sombre character, (being principally in the minor mood, in which she revels,) evidenced her strong points in dramatic music of a wonderful cast; of which however, there was too great a preponderance. A bit of genuine healthful sunshine would have been such a relief! All of her renderings bore marks of artistic culture, and her enunciation was remarkably clear and distinct; but her intonation was frequently faulty, and marred the effect, which would otherwise have been so fine. She sings with deep pathos and feeling, and is a great favorite with a Worcester audience.

Miss Liebe added to her reputation by an excellent performance of a Vieuxtemps Fantasia for violin, rendered with combined delicacy, finish and strength, to which she added refined expression and artistic feeling. She seems a genuine musician whom public flattery will not spoil. The Orpheus Society, while singing with good time and a fair expression, fell far short of the requirements.

CINCINNATI is preparing for a grand Musical Festival next May,—not in the noisy Gilmore "Jubilee" sense, but a genuine artistic festival. It will consist of six performances, beginning on Tuesday the 6th, and ending on Friday, the 9th day of May. Saturday, the 10th, will be devoted to a grand open air concert. The conductorship has been confided to THEODORE THOMAS, whose orchestra will, of course, render admirable service. The chorus, enlarged by delegations from all the societies of that part of the country, will be large enough for the effective production of great choral music, without competing with the childishly colossal models that have had their day in "Athens." Among the works to be given are Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum," Mozart's very short but perfect "Ave verum," Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," Schubert's Twenty-third Psalm, Schumann's "Gipsy Chorus," choruses from Tannhäuser, &c. A neatly printed copy of a portion of this music, published by John Church & Co., of Cincinnati, lies before us. Success to the Ohio Festival!

The "Cincinnati Orchestra" gave its first concert at Pike's Opera House, Dec. 17th. Church's Musical Visitor says it was a triumphant beginning.

The following was the programme:

- Overture—"Abencerragen".....Cherubini.
- Symphony—B min. (unfinished).....Schubert.
- a. allegro moderato. b. andante con moto.
- Ballade et Polonaise.....Vieuxtemps.
- George Brand.
- Overture—"Jubel".....Flotow.
- Waltz—"Geschichten aus den Wiener Wald," Strauss.
- "Legends from the Vienna Forest."
- Ave Maria.....Schubert.....For Orchestra, by F. Lux.
- a. Pizzicato Polka.....Strauss.
- b. Par Force. ("Polka Schnell")

The orchestra comprises the following force: First violins 6, second violins 5, violas 4, cellos 3, bass 3, flutes 2, oboes 2, clarinets 2, bassoons 2, horns 4, cornets 2, trombones 3, tuba 1, timpani 1, drum and caisse 1.

The following mention of other concerts is from the same source:

On Thursday evening, December 17th, the Harmonic Society gave a concert in aid of the charitable enterprise, at Pike's Opera House, under the direction of Prof. Barus. Very near one hundred members of the popular organization took part in the concert, which was a delightful affair, meriting the highest praise. The following programme was performed:

- 1. Overture—Oberon.....Weber.
- 2. Chorus—"All Men, All Things"—Hymn of Praise.....Mendelssohn.
- 3. Tenor Solo—"Sleep Well,".....F. Abt.
- 4. Rondo de Concert—Duet for two Flutes.....Furstenau.
- 5. Quartet—"A te o Cara".....Donizetti.
- 6. Solo and Chorus—"Hear my Prayer".....Mendelssohn.
- 7. Overture.....Rossini.
- 8. Chorus—"Ave Verum".....Mozart.
- 9. Aria from Figaro—"Non so più".....Mozart.
- 10. Fantasia from Lombardi.....Verdi.
- 11. March and Chorus from Tannhäuser.....Wagner.

THE CLASSICAL CHAMBER CONCERT

given at College Hall, on December 11th, by Messrs. Andre, Flechter and Geisselbrecht, assisted by Miss Emma Heckle, was one of the most pleasant features of the month. This was the second of the series of afternoon concerts, and the audience, though not so large as it should have been, showed an increase over the first concert. The following was the programme:

- 1. Sonate A major—Piano and violin.....Beethoven.
- 2. Divertissement for violoncello.....Dotzauer.
- 3. { Wanderstunden.....Heller.
- { Impromptu.....Schubert.
- { Berceuse.....Chopin.
- { Polonaise.....Andre.
- 4. Soprano Solos. { The Recognition.....Proch.
- { Der Neugierige.....Schubert.
- 5. Violin Solo—Legende.....Wienlawski.
- 6. Quartet—E flat major.....Schumann.

PARIS.—At M. Pasdeloup's Sunday Popular Concerts at the Cirque, on the 22nd inst., the scheme comprised Beethoven's Symphony in C, No. 1, and Mendelssohn's in A minor; Meyerbeer's overture to the "Etoile du Nord"; the air de ballet from Rameau's "Dardanus"; and an adagio by Herr Joachim Raff, of Wiesbaden. The "Marche Scherzo," by M. Saint-Saëns, the organist and pianist, who played at Mr. John Ella's Musical Union, has been successfully executed at M. Pasdeloup's concerts, whilst Berlioz's "Ballet des Sylphes," from his "Damnation de Faust," has been encored at two of the Conservatoire concerts. La Société Nationale de Musique, at the Salle Pleyel, in full force in Paris, where new works by MM. Duvernoy, Lacombe, Saint-Saëns, Lalo, Pfeiffer, Fissot, Jacquard, and Arningaud, &c., have been produced.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Nannie and I. 2. Eb to c. Harrington. 30
- "When we gathered the sweet Arbutus, Nannie and I!"
- One of the sweetest of sweet ballads.
- When the Song-bird says Good-night. Song and Cho. 3. Bb to f. Hunley. 30
- "I'll wait thy coming, Annie."
- Melodious love song.
- Will you miss me. Song and Cho. 3. Bb to g. Pratt. 30
- "Will you miss me? Tell me true."
- Smooth and musical words by Geo. Cooper, and the air worthy of the words.
- Minnie Jean. 3. F to f. Harrington. 30
- "Can you, my love, forget?"
- Thinking and Dreaming. 3. D to g. Tours. 40
- "I'll think of thee the whole day long."
- Sweet Memories of Thee. 3. D to g. M. F. H. Smith. 30
- "The mystic moonbeams gently fall.
The above three songs may be noticed together, having the same general character, and are melodious popular ballads. The accompaniment of the second is a trifle difficult.
- Esmeralda. 4. D (major and minor) to d. Levey. 50
- "Where is the little gipsy's home?
Under the greenwood tree."
- A very pretty, showy piece for concert or other singing. The melody has a kind of dance movement which is very pleasing.
- Sands of Dee. 3. C to d. Southard. 30
- "O Mary go and call the cattle home."
- A pensive Scotch song.
- From this Wildly Throbbing Heart. (Ah, vous dirai-je). Vocal Variations. 6. G to c. Adam. 60
- "Love is life, and life is love.
Ohne Liebe lebt man nicht.
Peut-on vivre sans amour!"
- French, German and English words. A sure success for those who can sing it, as the pretty familiar melody, alternating with difficult and sparkling variations, will "bring down" any house.
- Good Bye. 3. A to g. Tully. 30
- "When evening shadows fall—and all is still."
- O Silver Moon. 4. Bb to f. Tully. 30
- "Ye midnight stars who far away are shining."
- Beautiful songs in excellent taste.

Instrumental.

- March from "L'Ombre." 3. F. J. S. Knight. 30
- Nervous, full, wide-awake music.
- Trois Idylles. No. 1. Le Calme. 4. G. Loeschhorn. 30
- Not so very calm, as there is considerable action to it, but wonderfully pretty.
- New Vienna Waltzes. Violin and Piano. 3. Strauss. 75
- Does not need puffing. Only try it.
- Moment Musical. 3. A. Perabo. 40
- Extremely delicate and pretty, original and not difficult. Mr. P., who could play it, probably, with his little finger, deserves credit for restraining his invention, and producing a piece which every one can play and enjoy.
- Myrtle Wreath Waltz. 3. Edward Strauss. 60
- Edward is not John, but this one waltz proclaims him a near relation, and with a full share of the family talent.
- Happy Thoughts Waltz. 3. A. Nair. 35
- A happy inspiration suggested it. Indeed it has a Nair that is pleasant to hear.
- Adelphi March. 3. C. Mandelbaum. 30
- A robust and energetic chorus part, and a bright set of pizzicato passages in the trio.
- Silver Ripples. Mack. each 30
- No. 16. Piggy Wiggy Schottish. No. 17. Garnet Redowa. No. 19. Reverie Contemplation.
- Piggy Wiggy and the rest are all fingered and prepared nicely for young learners.
- Commemoration Grand March. 3. C. Clark. 50
- We are always commemorating something, and here is a good march ready for the occasion.
- Melodies of Spring. No. 10. Maggie's Secret. 3. F. Wyman. 30
- Neat variations of a well-known air.
- Trois Nocturnes. No. 3. 4. F minor. Egghard. 35
- A minor and soothing melody, with abundance of graceful changes, which relieve it from the danger of being too soothing or monotonous.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note; if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 830.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 8, 1873.

VOL. XXXII. No. 22.

For Dwight's Journal of Music. Recollections of Chopin and Liszt.

From the German.

It was in 1828 that LENZ, in later years the author of "Beethoven et ses Trois Styles," and of "Beethoven, eine Kunststudie," but then a young man of nineteen, went to Paris to study music under Kalkbrenner. As he walked along the Boulevards he read the advertisement of a concert to be given in the Conservatory by M. Liszt, when a Concerto of Beethoven's would be performed. This notice was destined to have an important influence on his life. He little thought that Beethoven's works, almost unknown to him at that time, would afterwards induce him to write six volumes about them. Just as little did he imagine that he should become the personal friend of Liszt, and should publish in Berlin, in 1872, a small pamphlet entitled "Die Grossen Pianoforte Virtuosen unserer Zeit,"* from which we have taken the following extracts.

Incited, he tells us, by the handbill of the concert, he told his friends of his wish to become a pupil of Liszt. They all laughed at the notion, urging that Liszt had never given a lesson and was not even a professor of the piano. Not discouraged by their ridicule, he sought out Liszt and found him at home,—a rare occurrence, according to the great man's mother, who said that her Franz was almost always at church, no longer devoting himself exclusively to music. These were the days in which Liszt thought of becoming a St. Simonist. Liszt, a thin, pale young man of remarkably attractive features, was lying on a sofa lost in thought, and smoking a long Turkish pipe, in the midst of three pianos. As Lenz entered he neither moved nor appeared to see him. Lenz explained to him in French, the only language which Liszt then would tolerate, that his family had wished him to take lessons of Kalkbrenner, but that he preferred to apply to him, because he was going to play a Concerto of Beethoven's in public. Liszt's smile was like the gleam of a dagger in the sun. "Play me something," was the only reply.

"I will play Kalkbrenner's Sonata for the left hand," answered Lenz, supposing that he had said the right thing.

"I won't hear that; I don't know it, and don't wish to learn it," was the scornful rejoinder.

Poor Lenz was in despair, but he walked manfully to the nearest piano. "Not that," exclaimed Liszt, without changing his position, "the other," and Lenz went to the second piano and began the "Invitation to the Dance." At the three first A-flats not a sound was given forth by the instrument. What did it mean? He played on bravely to the first chords, when Liszt came up to him and, seizing his right hand, demanded: "What is that? it begins well."

* The Great Pianoforte Virtuoses of our Time.

"It is Weber's," answered Lenz.

"Did he write it for the piano? We only know his Robin des Bois here."

"Certainly," was the astonished reply, accompanied with an enumeration of some of his works and hearty admiration of them. Liszt begged him to bring whatever he had with him of Weber's, and promised to give him a lesson for the first time in his life, as Lenz had introduced him to Weber; adding that he need not play on that piano again, for it was only a little "mauvaise plaisanterie" of his, because Lenz spoke of Kalkbrenner. At the first lesson Liszt became more enamored of Weber. He expressed his delight at the Sonata in A flat by lively gestures and exclamations; and just before the conclusion of the first part of the Allegro, cried: "Stop, stop, what is that? I must look at that myself."

Think of a genius like Liszt for the first time listening to and performing Weber! It seemed with Liszt's rendering as if it were he who was teaching Weber to Lenz. Afterwards the whole world knew how he glorified Weber at the piano, and talked of the triumphal processions that he led with the composer in concert pieces throughout Europe.

In 1842 Lenz again went to Paris. His first visit there of course was to Liszt, whose mother received him most cordially with the news that her son had given up St. Simonism. Liszt's reception of his friend was hearty. "I must see you every day and order an Erard for you; we'll bring back the old times and play Weber's Sonatas," he said, "from the same sheets; those with your remarks written on them, they have always been kept by me as a sacred treasure. But I also want to know something of Chopin's."

"Whatever you please, only don't think of pay. A cup of coffee is all I want."

Those were never to be forgotten hours. Liszt was always in season, it was the "politesse du Roi." One morning he proposed a walk, inquiring first into the nature of Lenz's overcoat, who was rather proud of his tigerskin and brown velvet coat. "What an excitement you will create with that!" said the great pianist, as he saw the garment. "Why, I am the only man in Paris who could give you his arm in that hanseatic skin. Come, we'll eat macaroni at Broschi's, where Rossini goes, and sit at his table." As they walked through the Boulevards, stared at by the passers, the assertion was well verified. Chopin could not have walked in company with such a coat. George Sand would have been displeased.

In those days it was distingué not to return to Paris till very late in the fall. Chopin therefore could not come back, or else Sand would not permit it. Liszt could wait for him no longer, so he gave his card to Lenz, with the magic words written on it: Laissez passer.—FRANZ LISZT. "Give that to Chopin," he said; "without a laissez passer you would never see him; that's the way with first-class authors and artists, we can't afford to waste our time. Go about two o'clock to the Cité d'Orléans, where he lives. Sand is there too, and Dantan and Viardot; they spend the evenings at a German countess's; perhaps Chopin will take you, but don't ask him to introduce you to Sand. He is 'ombrageux.'"

"He has not your courage."

"No, poor Frederic, he has not."

At last Lenz could see Chopin; he gave the card to the servant, who declared that Chopin was not at home. "Give him this card and leave the rest to me," Lenz insisted. Soon, card in hand, Chopin appeared,—a young man of medium size, worn looking with a languishing, speaking face, and the finest Parisian dress. He did not even motion Lenz to a seat, who stood as if before a lord.

"What do you want? Are you a scholar of Liszt's, an artist?" was the unflattering question.

"A friend of Liszt's, who desired the pleasure of learning your Mazurkas under your guidance, for I regard them as a literature; some I have already studied with Liszt." Careless words, and too late.

"Indeed!" politely drawled Chopin. "What do you want of me, then? Play me what you learned with Liszt. I have a few minutes to spare, was just going out, had closed my door, you are excused."

As thirteen years before, Lenz was in an awkward situation; yet there was no fear of another examination after one with Liszt, so he opened the piano, (a Pleyel, Chopin used no other). Chopin leaned as if fatigued upon the instrument, looking right into his face. Lenz but ventured a glance at him and boldly struck into the Mazurka in B-flat major, the one for which Liszt had given him some variations. The Pleyel was easier than the Erard had been. Lenz did well. Chopin obligingly whispered: "That trait is not yours. He showed you that. He must put his hand on everything. Well, he can dare to; he plays before thousands, I before one. That's good. I'll give you lessons twice a week; it will be hard for me to find three-quarters of an hour. What are you reading?"

"Geo. Sand, and Jean Jacques first of all."

Chopin smiled. "Liszt told you to say that; I see you are initiated; so much the better; be punctual. My house is a dove-cot. We shall become better acquainted with each other. A recommendation from Liszt means something; you are the first scholar he has sent me; we are friends, we were comrades."

Lenz went long before the appointed time and waited. One lady after another came, besides Filtsch, a wonderful boy, with whom Chopin played. His playing lacked in physical strength, but his grace and elegance were unattainable; and when he indulged in any ornament it was always the apotheosis of taste. Only in earlier years could Chopin have obtained a position by the side of Liszt. Now he only played once a year, half in public, in a chosen circle of his scholars and admirers, amidst the highest society, when the tickets were taken beforehand and distributed privately.

"Do you study when the concert day comes?" asked Lenz.

"I don't like the public, but it belongs to my position. Fourteen days I shut myself up and play Bach; that's my preparation; I never practice my own compositions."

Lenz told him that his Mazurkas were Heine's Songs on the piano.

Chopin played in an absent fashion with the chain of his watch, which he always placed on the instrument during the lesson, lest it should transgress the three quarters of an hour, and said: "Yes, you understand me; I would willingly listen to you if you would play me something for the first time. When you are prepared, it is no longer the same thing, but mediocre."

"So Liszt said," slipped from the unfortunate Lenz.

"Then I do not wonder that you think I am right," was the biting and bitter answer.

"Liszt said of your Mazurkas, that a new piano of the first rank must be harnessed before each one."

"Liszt is always right. Do you think I satisfy myself in my Mazurkas? Never. A couple of times I have happened to, when I was elevated by the feeling of the people there; they must hear me once a year, the rest is work. See, there's the Valse mélancolique; that you can't play alive. You understand the piece well, so I'll write you something. An autograph of Chopin's is rare; no letter or note would he write. "George Sand," he said, "writes so beautifully that no one else has a right to." Whenever he was pleased with a scholar he would make a cross under the particular passage with his fine-pointed pencil. When Lenz had received two in the Nocturne in E-flat, Op. 9, Chopin said: "Leave me at rest now; I don't like the piece. I never give more than three. You can't improve on it."

"You play it so beautifully that no one else can dare to try?"

"Liszt can," said Chopin, dryly, and would not play it again for Lenz. He had written down for him little important changes in it; his notes were neat, clean and sharp.

As Liszt had said, Chopin took Lenz to the German countess's one evening, telling him as they mounted the stairs, that he must play something, but nothing of his. "Play Weber's Invitation." George Sand never spoke of an introduction; that was impolite. So Lenz seated himself near her. Chopin fluttered about like a frightened bird in a cage; he saw something coming. At the first pause in the conversation Chopin led Lenz to the piano; he played the Invitation fragmentarily. Chopin shook his hand in a friendly way. George Sand kept silence. Lenz placed himself near her again. Chopin looked anxiously at them.

"Shall you not go to Petersburg, where you are so much read and honored?" inquired Lenz of Sand, in the bitterest tone.

"I shall never lower myself to a land of slaves," was the short answer.

"After all you are right in not coming, you might find the doors closed." (He was thinking of the Emperor Nicholas.) George Sand gazed at him astonished; he looked calmly into her great brown eyes. Chopin was not displeased, judging by the motions of his head. Instead of any reply, Sand rose theatrically and walked like a man through the saloon to the blazing fire. Lenz followed her and seated himself for the third time near her. At last she must say something; instead of that she drew out an enormously thick cigar from her pocket, calling: "Frederic, a fidibus." How sorry Lenz felt for Chopin! He understood in its full meaning Liszt's exclamation of "poor Frederic!" Chopin staggered in obediently with a fidibus. After the first frightful cloud of smoke, Sand deigned to address him. "In Petersburg I could not smoke in a saloon."

"I have never seen a cigar smoked in any saloon," he replied with emphasis and a deep bow. Sand looked fixedly at him; he glanced quietly around at the fine pictures, each of which was lighted with a special lamp. Chopin had heard nothing.

Poor Frederic! The next day some one at Lenz's hotel said to him: "A gentleman and lady called. I told them you were not at home, as you had not said that you would receive; the gentleman left his name, as he had no card;" and Lenz heard: "Chopin and Mme. George Sand." At the following lesson Chopin said: "George Sand went with me to see you; what a pity you were not at home. She thought she had been impolite to you and saw how amiable you were; you pleased her." From that time Lenz enjoyed special favors. He had pleased Sand: that was a diploma. Sand had honored him with a visit: that was promotion.

Meyerbeer entered Lenz's room once when Chopin was giving him his lesson. He was not announced, for he was king. Lenz was playing the Mazurka in C, Op. 88. "That is two-quarter time," said Meyerbeer. Chopin contradicted him and bade Lenz repeat the passage, keeping time with his pencil on the piano, his eyes glowing.

"Two quarters," said Meyerbeer, quietly.

"Three quarters," insisted Chopin, loudly, his cheeks flushing.

"Give it to me for a ballet in my opera; I'll show it to you then."

"It is three quarters," almost screamed Chopin and played it himself, counting aloud, stamping the time with his foot. He was beside himself. It availed nothing. Meyerbeer would not yield, and so they parted angrily.

Poor Chopin! he died of sadness. George Sand speaks of him in her new book, "A Winter in the South of Europe," not by name, but as "the artist." Though not depreciative, it lacks in justice, is simply full of Parisian queerness. How could a French nature understand Chopin? A Sand, who could go no further in music than: "Tous moi quelque chose," "Frederic, a fidibus." The artist was in a web, and the spider was ready. Chopin's compositions open a new era on the piano, though incurring the danger of not being understood, because they seem different on the paper from what they do in their adequate tonal life. As expressive of the instrument, as treatment of it, they are beyond Weber's, asserting the first place in the literature of the piano. They are not cosmic, but elegiac, lyrical. From the standpoint of the nationality of their creator, they are ideal and immortal in the history of the musical mind.

The Symphony Concerts

(From the Daily Advertiser, Jan. 22.)

Mr. George William Curtis in the Easy Chair department of Harper's Monthly for February fires a shot at Boston musical performance which is partly deserved and partly undeserved. It is doubtless convenient for Mr. Curtis's purposes to assume that the programmes of the Harvard symphony concerts are exclusively or chiefly made up from the compositions of Bach. As a matter of fact there has been but one "number" on the whole series of programmes this season taken from that composer's works. Mr. Curtis represents the people who attend classical concerts as groaning under a bondage. They dislike the make-up of the programmes, and apparently they dislike music in general; but they go because it is the fashion. We cannot constitute ourselves judges of the motives of the Harvard audiences, and we cannot guess how general were the confidences that were poured into the sympathizing ear of the Easy Chair. We presume, however, that our concert-goers are no more and no less the slaves of fashion than other people. Mr. Curtis would probably admit that a real appreciation of what is termed classical music is evidence of a higher culture than a general liking for music; just as an appreciation of the best works of great sculptors and painters indicates a better knowledge of art than a fondness for paintings, good and bad alike. That there are some people in Boston who do have a taste for classical music cannot be doubted. That they are influential enough to secure a series of ten concerts a year, with programmes to their liking, is at least an argument in favor of the teachableness of the Boston public. If many go, as many undoubtedly do go, merely to put on a show of love for classical music, their support of these concerts, even from motives not the best, makes them pecuniarily successful and secures one of the highest pleasures to those who do enjoy them. And so long as concerts of the highest class can be supported there is no necessity for lowering the standard. When "Hamlet" has a long run in New York, we do not suppose it is because all those who go to the theatre prefer Shakespearean tragedy to the "Black Crook," but it is nevertheless a hopeful sign for the drama when even fashion holds people to the legitimate drama.

The Harvard Concerts

[By George W. Curtis in Harper's Monthly.]

It was with amazement that the Easy Chair heard a voice say in the city of Boston as the crowd was thronging out of Music hall after a Harvard classical concert: "This Bach business is a fashion that has nearly gone out!"

"Shame!" said a severe voice; "some of us will stand by the ark to the last. Don't you know that Rubinstein will never play in a concert where Strauss's name and music are upon the programme?"

"He is ill at those 'numbers,' I suppose," said a sarcastic voice, emphasizing the "numbers" in derision of the pedantry of musical criticism which describes the various pieces by that word.

But another voice began to hum the Blue Danube waltz.

"Shame, I say again," exclaimed Severity. "How can a rational being with a soul for music profess pleasure in the shallow tum-ti-tum tum-ti-tum of Strauss's waltzes! Why, I remember in other days when Ralph Yale, fresh from his musical studies in Germany, jumped up from his seat in the parquet during Norma, and said that the tum-ti-tum of the accompaniment would drive him mad if he did not leave the theatre. And he departed."

"Good riddance," said the Blue Danube, intermitting the humming only long enough to say it.

"I repeat," said the first voice, firmly, "that the Bach business is gone by. There are fashions in music, as there are in painting and architecture and oratory and bonnets. Thank mercy, Bach is going with the old pokes and the coal-scuttles."

The Easy Chair trembled as it heard such musical blasphemy in the very adytum of the temple. It had been listening in the lofty but dim and melancholy hall to the performance of a noble orchestra, and to singing and virtuoso-playing. The audience sat in grim propriety, and there was an occasional sound of grave applause. But as the Easy Chair listened to the music and watched the other listeners, it became conscious of some spell, as often in a church when everybody painfully attends to the preacher, and yet it is folly to pretend that anybody cares for the sermon. The audience gradually became a congregation engaged in unwilling worship, and as the eyes of the observer wandered about the hall they suddenly saw the colossal bronze statue of the great master Beethoven standing before the great organ. The huge figure fronting the audience with thunders upon its tremendous brow, its hands clasped, and with an aspect of Titanic defiance, suddenly became in the frightened imagination of the Easy Chair an enormous idol sternly glaring at its worshippers, and seeming to say, "Cease to worship at your peril!"

Simultaneously there was a prolonged fugue movement in the orchestra, a series of unmelodic vanishings of sound, giving the impression of frightened instruments escaping pell-mell in every direction from that awful presence. The audience assumed an appearance of grotesque anxiety to placate the offended deity; and the Easy Chair, with imagination now seriously disordered, fancied that the attention of the worshippers had momentarily swerved from their devotions, and that, half suspecting the colossus had perceived it, they now redoubled the grimness of their propriety, that he might believe himself deceived.

"What thunders upon that majestic brow!" remarked the Easy Chair, with a sense of awe, to a young neighbor.

"Yes, a thundering scowl," returned the young neighbor, aggressively, as if his thoughts were impatiently, and even indignantly, wandering from the solemn theme.

"How very Bach-like!" suggested the Easy Chair, anxious to be Roman in Rome, and to recall its erring neighbor.

"If 'twere only Bacchic, the subscriber would shout hallelujah," was the astounding reply. It was a young man evidently capable of liking the Blue Danube waltz or of any similar sin.

The Easy Chair found itself looking furtively about, and wondering whether there were other scoffers of the same reckless character. But it lost its breath when its young neighbor wantonly whispered: "I wish those confounded fiddles would stop wallowing and floundering in the inexpressible and the unattainable, and play a waltz."

The instinct of the Easy Chair was to make the sign of the cross, but after a few moments of recovery it answered that it thought melody was accounted sacrilege and profanation in that temple of harmony.

"Certainly it is," said the young neighbor, in a tone of anguish; "it is absolutely forbidden. We are not allowed to have it." Then lowering his voice and looking apprehensively around, like a Spaniard in the days of the inquisition, or a Venetian trembling before the Ten, he said in a startled whisper: "There's one that rules us with a rod of iron. He thinks melody is wicked! He's all for what I call mummied music—nothing but actual ancient mummies or their modern imitators. A little mummy is well enough, but, O dear anonymous stranger! mummy all the time is dreadful! You see how it is, we all look like mummies ourselves. What with the rod of iron and that brazen giant upon the platform—de profundis clamavi!"

Yet when the Easy Chair asked if the worshippers did not enjoy the worship, the young neighbor said: "Who can tell? They don't dare to say whether they do or not. We are all taught to think that this alone is music. As if there could be no poetry except Paradise Lost! Good? Why, of course 'tis the very best. But who wants the very best all the time? Am I accursed if I do not always wish to read of fate, free-will, fore-knowledge absolute?" My stuttering friend thought that M-M-M-Macaulay was a good writer, but shall there be nothing but Macaulay? "Pooh!" said the young neighbor, contemptuously. "Do you see that old fellow with the pig-tail? That's old Wax Candles. Do you suppose he cares about Bach?"

It's the fashion to come, and he comes. If 'twere the fashion to sit on the State-house steps he'd piously seat himself and look as if he liked it. Come, now, I have my theory as well as old Rod of Iron, and my theory is that anybody who is susceptible to music delights in all, as a man who has song in his soul, and enjoys Shakespeare's sonnets, and the Divine Comedy, also likes Burns. I tell you, sir, compassionate sir, if you will allow me," said the young neighbor,—"for really I feel toward you as the unhappy spirits in the Inferno felt toward Dante and his guide,—I tell you that our fate is dreadful; and I believe that if, at the end of this insufferable thing which sounds like a complicated exercise, the orchestra should go off into an airy measure, full of easy and comprehensive melody, the congregation would be delighted."

The justification of the opinion was in the remark overheard by the Easy Chair that the "Bach business is a fashion that has nearly gone out." Is it perhaps possible that even the Harvard concerts have been too severely classical? Is there a tendency in the development of musical taste, as in that of wine, to a constantly drier and drier flavor? The Easy Chair has sat at sumptuous tables where the champagne was as dry as old Rhenish; and although it knew that its character of connoisseur would be forever lost with the courteous host, it has ventured to say: "Oh for a beaker of d'Asti!" 'Tis a sweet foaming wine of Piedmont. When the young neighbor sighed and groaned and raged furiously like the heathen at that music, it was satiety with the dry old Bach vintage and a longing for the sweet foaming liquor of Strauss or another.

And, indeed, as the Easy Chair reflected upon all the voices that it heard that day, and upon the sombre hall, yet noble with its double galleries and lofty height, it remembered that while the massive and grand Beethoven stands upon the platform, high in an opposite niche is the Apollo of the Belvedere, smiling and graceful, springing gayly forward into the hall. Shall not he also be worshipped in that temple of harmony? Shall not the strains to which all hearts beat time, and to which all feet and canes and umbrellas would do likewise, if it were seemly—not the "Blue Danube" only, but all that it stands for—shall not these be heard mingling with the other, lest the other prove by too great severity to be, as the first voice said, a fashion?

Schumann's Music.

(From the Arcadian, New York.)

It is thirty-five years since Liszt wrote in the Gazette Musicale the first public recognition of the characteristics of Schumann's music, the first at least which was satisfactory to the composer. From that day to this the fame of Schumann has been growing in Germany. It was four or five years after Liszt's praise that Chorley wrote home to England the first tidings about Schumann which had reached that island. He told of a preposterous charlatan who had a style, it was true, but whose style was only "a certain thickness freaked with frivolity," and whom some presumptuous Germans thought of elevating to the pedestal made vacant by the ever-lamentable death of Mendelssohn. In a word this person's performances were "transcendental." That is to say, Mr. Chorley did not understand them; that is to say they were bad. Since then English opinion has got the start of the majestic Chorley. Schumann's widow has interpreted Schumann's works until the English public learned to endure and then to inquire. But Schumann has not yet the comparative standing in England that he has either in Germany or here.

The introduction of Schumann's orchestral music in America has been wrought mainly through German influence, and specially through the efforts of Mr. Thomas. It has come to pass now, that in all symphony concerts he has the lead of Mendelssohn. But what was known here of his piano-forte composition up to within two or three years we owed very largely to the enthusiasm of Mr. William Mason, both by precept in his teaching and by example in his public performances. And then came Miss Mehlig, who played Schumann steadily, and Miss Krebs. And now has come Rubinstein, and played Schumann to an unprecedented extent, and in an unprecedented way. So that now the most characteristic piano-forte compositions of Schumann are on every dealer's shelves. It is worth inquiring what are the characteristics of this music, thus become fashionable, in the same sense in which Bach may be said to be fashionable [?] in Boston, without becoming in any proper sense popular.

In the first place this piano-forte music is primarily music, and not pianism. This peculiarity differences it at once from the work of Chopin, and much more of Liszt, and allies it with that of Beethoven. But here resemblance ceases, except that, like Beethoven, Schumann depends entirely for effect upon the inner, that is the endogenous, development of his idea. Beethoven works out his themes by variations properly so called. Schumann's method is different not only from this but from the method of any other master. His themes are detached and appear in different parts and different forms, acquiring strength by progress, gaining at every change a new sense and a fresh meaning, undergoing as a rule little or no melodic or rhythmic change, undergoing however a variety of harmonic or modulatory changes. In the former case the theme itself is changed; in the latter, it is merely put in new aspects. As half a dozen bits of glass assume ever new appearances under the revolutions of a kaleidoscope, so a phrase of half a dozen notes is shown by Schumann to be capable of assuming shapes as varied. The "Carnival" is built upon four notes; the six fugues on B A C H also upon four. It is not a process of subtraction and addition, but of analysis and synthesis. After the whole has been almost lost by dismemberment the parts suddenly reunite, and the climax is thus reached. Thus comes the constant rhythmic swing which is so strongly marked in all his compositions. The motives themselves, by their individuality of merit and beauty, easily lend themselves to this treatment. His aim seems to be, and the result certainly is, neatness of handling, and the production of a rounded and symmetrical total, a musical unit, homogeneous, every part of which is essential to the whole. It is as an entirety, and in its entirety that the work appears, and thus it lives in the ear and the memory like the "Traumerei" and the "Warum."

In the essentially lyric bent of his genius Schumann resembles Chopin more than any other man. But there is in Schumann the artistic element of repose, and the intellectual attribute of concentration, which Chopin lacked; and he lacks the fluency which Chopin had, and which in Chopin so often became diffuseness. Fluency easily obtained is a snare. It was only by a struggle for musical expression that Schumann came to attain that classic severity which marks his music, and to reject utterly whatever was not essential to his end. Schumann's music is the memorandum of his thought. By this sacrificial style Schumann goes more directly at his effect, and attains his goal much more quickly. Much of Chopin's music sounds like an improvisation, and betrays the mannerism of the executant, mingled with or overlaying the inner thought of the musician. That is, it is primarily piano-forte music. The musical ideas are often lost sight of in a labyrinth of "piano-forte passages," thrown in as such; they are intellectually disconnected from the main subject—that is, he rambles. Schumann never rambles in this way. This seems strange, at first sight, since Chopin seems to take pains to reveal his thought and to blazon forth his passion, and Schumann to veil his. It is disguised by every artifice of form—transposition, putting the motive as accompaniment, making it do every sort of menial duty, and appear in all manner of disguises and transformations. But Chopin's music, though always pleasing and even delightful and musically—that is, sensuously—an unit, is logically fragmentary. Schumann, though often abrupt, and to the unaccustomed sense at times fragmentary, is never so logically. Chopin often loses his idea in his music; Schumann never. The one is the seryant, the other the master of his genius. There is always to be got from Schumann's work the impression of intellectual power rigorously devoted to attaining a definite end, to the attainment of which everything is subordinated. His music is more homogeneous than Chopin's, and consequently purer. And the effect of it is healthier, because it is more concise and stronger by concentration and rejection. In Chopin you feel that the inspiration is throughout æsthetically high, and that the result cannot be other than beautiful. But in all the maturer works of Schumann you have a clearer impression of the individual "thing of beauty," which you feel is to grow upon rehearing, to be recalled as a unit, and so to become a joy forever.

The "Songs Without Words" of Mendelssohn come in for comparison very fairly, since they correspond, in length and in purpose, to a great part of Schumann's piano-forte compositions. Compare them, and see how weak Mendelssohn is where Schumann is so strong. The themes of the "Lieder" are tame, and the treatment flat, monotonous, and mentally and contrapuntally commonplace by comparison. The theme is a simple flowing melody uppermost throughout, and with a uniform accompaniment. How different the many-sidedness of the shortest composition of Schumann! The first bar of "Warum" rouses attention, and as it goes on, the melody weaving in and out of itself, different parts of it sounding at once, with the throbbing syncopated accompaniments now below and now above the struggling theme,—how unique is the effect! How strange and how suggestive are the modulations which bring into such strong relief the focal points of the struggle, and lead in again the simple melody, now peaceful and tranquil, because tranquilized by treatment! The "Songs without Words" appear in the comparison the common language of a polished man and scholar. "Warum" and its kindred productions are the passionate utterances of an inspired poet.

Schumann's study of older composers, and particularly of Bach, is apparent enough. But, although polyphonic in the highest degree, the polyphony of Schumann is of an entirely original mould. There is no trace of pedantry, but the aroma of poetry in all his work. He has acquired the old science, but he has utilized it for his own purposes. His treatment of his Canti Fermi, essentially and aesthetically, is like no other. Like all good music, the worth of his appeals to the eye, as well as to the ear, and is discernible upon ocular study. No music of which this is not true can be possessed of remarkable intellectual merit. But in sensuous effect, it does not belie nor fall below the ocular impression. It is pure music, it grows upon hearing and rehearing, and the aesthetic beauty of it is in no whit inferior to the intellectual strength it displays, whatever has been said or may be said to the contrary. The native vigor of it carries it successfully through the dangerous ordeal of transcription. The Romanze and Scherzo, from the D-minor symphony, transcribed for organ or piano, is unequalled in effectiveness by any similar transcription from the symphonic works of Beethoven. Schumann is more purely musical even than any of his contemporaries, and more akin in this to the old masters, of whom, for spontaneity, Mozart must be reckoned first. His work is an idealization in sounds of the impressions produced in him by every-day scenes and characters. Intensely subjective, his pieces are specimens of pure musical thought, disengaged from all disturbing influences and working from within outwards, by exclusion of everything foreign to the thought. They are musical problems, for the solution of which everything in them must be reckoned. The manner, like the matter, is enigmatic, but carrying its own solution, awakening interest, and holding it and gratifying it.

But it is impossible that such music should ever become popular concert music. Neither Rubinstein nor any other pianist can make it available in that direction. Such a use is forbidden by the nature of the music itself. There is no virtuosity in it. Schumann's climaxes and effects are for the inner rather than the outer ear. He prefers to startle the mind of the player or listener rather than either to dazzle the eye or smite the ear. Chopin's music is not so good for concert purposes as Liszt's, and Schumann's is less available than either, being more purely intellectual and essential music, and possessing absolutely none of the elements of clat.

But for meditative playing and practice, as parlor and chamber music, Schumann's music is perfect; cast less in the archaic mould than Beethoven's; more intensely lyrical even than Chopin's, in that it employs more exclusively the singing and sympathetic part of the piano, the centre, and rarely invades either extreme of the keyboard, and having here, also, the advantage of Beethoven, who accepted the traditional virtuoso use of the instrument; depending entirely for its effect upon the intricate involution of musical ideas. It has come to be valued as such by many musicians, and it will grow soon to include the whole of its "audience, fit though few." For range and versatility, Schumann yields to many men; for intellectual grasp and depth of passion, to none. In its own sphere, his piano music is classic in the full and exact sense; the best of its kind. It is invaluable to musicians who wish to stimulate invention by contact with a strong and original mind, and to follow a guide through a gold mine almost unexplored. Standing on the intellectual and aesthetic level of Beethoven, Schumann, as he is revealed in his piano-forte compositions, overlooks a long line of contemporaries, beginning with Mendelssohn and Chopin, and ending with Gottschalk. Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, JAN. 22.—As you have had an experience of fire in Boston you know that it is not on the whole an advantage to musical interests. The times have been dull here this winter and in no way more so than in music. We had Rubinstein for one blessed week, and that was good. The present writer is one who would not undertake to criticize that great artist. Suffice it to say that such a series of programmes of the very best pianoforte music, so played, is an experience to be remembered as long as this rural breast shall beat with enthusiasm for music.

Our Oratorio Society, under Mr. Butterfield's direction, have been "pottering along" all winter on one or two choruses from "Naaman." They had their first entertainment of the season, a combined lecture and concert (an artistic mermaid) cooked up for last Thursday evening in the First Congregational Church. This was the most beautiful Protestant church in the city, and had a seating capacity of about 2500. About seven o'clock in the evening fire was discovered near one of the furnaces, and within two or three hours only walls and ashes remained to tell the tale. The trustees had been wiser than the children of light sometimes are, and had laid up a certain amount of treasure in the insurance offices, from which about $115,000 will be forthcoming, and this will probably be enough to replace the building. The organ was a beauty and has gone up to see Elijah, where it is to be hoped it will learn better than to play the Miserere from "Trovatore" in church—a trick it has been guilty of more than once during its mortal life.

The Oratorio Society lose all their books again. Was ever such fortune? Still they are out with a promise of the entertainment this week. Mr. Butterfield, the leader, lost about one hundred copies of the "Chorus Wreath" which were loaned to the Society. The minister saved his library or the most of it. The society will worship over the way with a small Presbyterian society,—the first time I ever saw a quart put into a pint cup.

We have also had a feeble week of English Opera with the charming Mrs. Seguin and piquante Rose Hersée, but I did not attend and know only by general report that the ensemble was what they used to call in the country, "Small potatoes and few in a hill!"

But if musical performances have diminished, the business of selling music has increased. Before the fire the most of the business of music and music books was done by Root & Cady and Lyon & Healy. These sold about $500,000 per year of sheet music and music books alone. After the fire Root & Cady sold their large but somewhat passé catalogue to Messrs. Brainard and John Church & Co., and this temporarily put a stop to the career of Chicago as a music manufacturing centre. After a year of hard work Root & Cady have been obliged to succumb and have gone into bankruptcy. Messrs. Geo. F. Root & Sons have a small store far up on Wabash Avenue, and talk of buying the old Root & Cady stock and occupying their stand at the corner of Van Buren St. and Wabash. They have a very good trade, and represent the strong houses of Church and the Brainards. This firm is lucky enough to have a popular author of its own, and the way they are making books since the fire is no end of a wonder to me. Two of the partners of Root & Cady have formed a new firm by name of Root & Lewis, and have a store on State Street near Van Buren, where they sell general musical merchandize and the Weber piano. About the only publishing now done here is by Messrs. F. S. Chandler & Co., a small firm having a place on Wabash Avenue near 20th street. Another new firm is that of T. J. Elmore & Co., who have a sheet music store on Van Buren St. near Wabash Av. The "Co" is Mr. Newell, an experienced sheet music salesman, and they expect to keep a well-selected stock. Mr. J. A. Butterfield has also a small publishing business on West Madison St., dealing chiefly in his own songs, one of which ("When you and I were young, Maggie") has reached a sale of nearly 125,000 copies.

The other piano dealers came out of the fire all right, and are now again in full tide of business. They are Messrs. W. W. Kimball, J. Bauer & Co., and A. Reed & Sons. The Mason & Hamlin Organ Co. have opened a store of their own here, as their Chicago trade is larger than that in New York.

But by all odds the most complete house here is that of Lyon and Healy. They have a large store at the corner of State and Monroe streets, convenient to Madison Street, the great thoroughfare of the West Side with its 214,000 people, and opposite Potter Palmer's great hotel. They carry a large stock of sheet music both American and Foreign, and a full line of Ditson & Co's musical publications and general musical merchandize. Their store occupies five floors. The first is in L form, running round the corner, about 30 feet wide by 150 ft. deep in the main part, and 60 feet in the short arm of the L. This floor is devoted to sheet music, organs, and the office of the firm. The ceiling is high, about 20 ft., and the store is furnished throughout in a plain and business-like manner. One misses entirely the beautifully carved panels of their old office on Wabash Avenue. The basement floor is devoted to books and packing. Here one will find a stock of five or six thousand Richardson's New Method, about half a cord of Reed Organ books, a large stock of the "Standard" and other new things, and a few bushels of every Oratorio published by Ditson & Co.

The second floor is about 60 by 150 ft., and is devoted to pianos and organs. It is finished in three rooms, one for upright pianos, one for squares and grands, and one for organs. The piano, of course, is the Steinway, and this department of the business is Smith and Nixon's.

This piano trade is very large, reaching something like $300,000 a year. They sold in December 72 pianos, of which 39 were upright pianos, besides many squares and a few grands.

On the next floor is the general merchandize, the imported goods of all sorts, violins, strings, etc., and above this the repair shop.

Taken all in all this is the most complete and convenient music store I happen to be acquainted with east or west, and as it is a business that has been built up by rare talent and enterprise, I thought it not unworthy a place in your artistic record. The appetite of this great West for musical goods is vast and steadily increasing, and I am glad to be able to state that the sale of better music is improving year by year. For all which no one is more thankful than

DER FREYSCHUTZ.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 10.—Last Saturday afternoon Mr. WOLFSOHN gave the fifth of his delightful series of matinées at Horticultural Hall. Raff's "Forest" was the Symphony of the day, and a noble work it is. With Beethoven's "Pastoral" as a model, the genius and active talent of Raff have wrought into form this valuable contribution to the "noble army" of Symphonies, and well up in the line must its place be. The opening movement, "Day" (Allegro) is somewhat too rich in themes, but the manner in which they are wielded into massive unity is truly wonderful. The "Twilight" movement (Largo) is tenderly delicate; and the fourth movement

"Night," may best be defined as a faithful sequel to "Twilight."

The final part of this movement: "Entrance and departure of the Wild Huntsmen," and "Daybreak," is not so pleasing as the former portions of the work, the themes being few and too long drawn out.

The orchestra and the conductor are to be sincerely congratulated upon the manner in which this work was presented,—carefully, precisely and intelligently, the only slight spots on the performance being due to individual shortcomings in the orchestra.

JAN. 17.—Last Saturday afternoon Mr. Wolfsohn's sixth orchestral matinée was given. The programme comprised Mozart's D-major Symphony; Leonore Overture, No. 3; and a Miss Rivé performed Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise with great taste and force.

On Tuesday, the 14th, we were gratified by the re-appearance of the RUBINSTEIN Troupe, which dropped us two more concerts in their southern flight. The programme on the first evening was full of attractions. Rubinstein gave his second Concerto, a much more pleasing work on a first hearing than the one he gave here at one of his previous concerts. As to the performance it was of course perfection in the piano part, and wonderfully good for the orchestra. In the second movement they are particularly good. The orchestration of this composition is most graceful and elegant; the frequent appearance of the reeds, and a lovely passage for strings alone in the second movement, being the most striking characteristics which now occur to me.

In part second Rubinstein appeared with a cluster of brilliants: a Nocturne by Field; a Capriccio of Mendelssohn; the Schubert Minuet which he gave once before; and Liszt's Valse des Soirées de Vienne; each differing from its predecessor and all perfect in presentation. His last gift to us in this programme was a group of Chopin's pieces; viz: Fantasia in A flat, Nocturne in D flat, and an Etude.

Wieniawski contributed Vieuxtemps' 5th Concerto; but while exquisite purity of tone was combined with finish and clearness to make the performance delightful, yet the master power with which Vieuxtemps gives it was wanting on the present occasion. In the second part he played his impressive "Faust" Fantasia. Gounod's creation seemed a thousand times more lovely when wafted from the magic strings of Wieniawski's violin. In response to the roars of applause he replied with the "Carnival of Venice." The Orchestra under Mr. Wolfsohn gave "Oberon," and the "Marriage of Figaro" Overture with pleasing effect. The lady singers acquitted themselves as usual.

I append the programme for the second concert:

Overture: "Fidelio".....	Orchestra.
"Concertstueck".....	Weber.
	Rubinstein.
The Violet.....	Mozart.
Ruck Ruck.....
	Mme. Liebhart.
Concerto for Violin, 1st movement.....	Beethoven.
	Wieniawski.
"Why?" "Bird as Prophet".....	Schumann.
"Traumeswirren".....
Turkish March.....	Beethoven.
Erl King.....	Schubert.
	Rubinstein.
La Zingara.....	Mme. Ormeny.
Legende. Aïra Russe.....	Wieniawski.
Gita in Gondola.....	Liszt.
Scherzo.....	Mendelssohn.
Barcarole, (5).....	Rubinstein.
Etude.....
	Rubinstein.
March. "Midsummer Night's Dream".....	Orchestra.

To criticize such performers, such master artists as these two, who is competent? What is the standard of excellence by which they are to be prized? If Anton Rubinstein be indeed "the greatest living pianist," then he must be the standard of excellence, and of course above criticism. [?] With Wieniawski the case is different, for there are many able connoisseurs who emphatically declare Vieuxtemps as his senior in excellence. I am not of them: but so long as any exist who hold to the former opinion, then it is, by my rule, theirs to criticize now and mine when Vieuxtemps may come.

When little peculiarities arise to our notice in their performances, as they must do, then may we mark them as they touch our inmost soul—gently and soothingly or jarringly and fretfully. For instance, it is one of the peculiarities of Rubinstein to play the rapid passages with too vigorous a speed. That is, it strikes me so; but I have voted him supremacy as an artist: then I rebel, or at least am guilty of inconsistency when I detract one iota of his attributes. In other words I am wrong in my judgment as to the rapidity of the execution; my own idea was not strong.

On Wednesday next Theodore Thomas and his Orchestra return for four performances. To-morrow afternoon Mr. Wolfsohn's seventh matinée takes place, and in the evening Mr. Jarvis gives his fourth soirée at Chickering Hall, The Handel & Haydn are to give, shortly, the "Creation," with Mrs. West, Mr. Simpson, and Mr. A. R. Taylor in the solo parts.

EUSTACE.

NEW YORK, FEB. 4.—The programme of THOMAS's fourth Symphony concert, at Steinway Hall last Saturday evening, began with Schumann's "Cologne" Symphony in E flat, No. 3, op. 97, which was rendered in a style that could not fail to satisfy the most critical. With such treatment, Schumann's music bids fair to obtain the recognition which it deserves and, perhaps, would have had ere this but for the fact that most of our orchestras are incapable of interpreting the composer's language with clearness. Two weeks ago the Symphony in C, which is generally considered as Schumann's greatest work, was performed by the N. Y. Philharmonic Orchestra, and I believed then that the lack of interest manifested by the audience was more than half owing to the badness of the performance. At the Thomas concert, the "Cologne" Symphony excited a lively interest, and the audience called for a repetition of the beautiful Allegretto, which however Mr. Thomas wisely declined to accord. I may as well state, also, that a young man and a young woman who sat in the next row back of me refrained from loud conversation during the Andante, thus giving me nearly five minutes uninterrupted enjoyment of the music, for which delicate consideration I desire publicly to express my thanks.

Second on the programme was Chopin's Concerto, No. 2, in F minor, for piano and orchestra, with Miss ANNA MEHLIG at the piano. Comparing her performance with that of Mr. Mills, who played the same composition at the Academy of Music, two weeks ago, I find far more warmth and poetry in her rendering than in his, but less ease and elegance of finish. Her interpretation of the first movement was too labored to be thoroughly enjoyed, and, although the Larghetto was beautifully played, her performance of the Concerto must be regarded as less artistic than that of Mr. Mills. The general effect of the Concerto as played by Miss Mehlig was, however, better than when it was played by Mr. Mills; for he was hampered and harassed by a wretched orchestral "accompaniment," (if it can be so called when the instruments are half a bar behind the piano), whereas she was aided and sustained by the orchestra, according to the composer's intention.

Part Second began with the Coriolanus overture, which cannot be heard too often; and then, in strange contrast came Liszt's Symphonic Poem: "Orpheus." An attempt was made to elucidate this piece by printing the composer's preface in the programme; but as this only serves to involve the hearer in greater uncertainty, I am forced to give it up as "one of those things that no fellow can find out." The printed description of the "Vorspiel zu die Meistersinger," which ended the concert, was really useful, and explained the music so well that I copy it.

Instead of the ideal and ethereal character so prominent in the broad sweeping undulations of the introduction to Lohengrin, we are confronted in "Die Meistersinger" with striking antitheses and bold combinations, overrunning with sparkling humor suggestive of the cheerful turmoil of a real German holiday festival. We see too the worthy citizens of Nuremberg following in procession the banner of King David. In front towers the lofty form of Hans Sachs. His songs of cheerful greeting resound from the lips of the happy and jubilant populace. Nor does the song of love remain long silent. Eva, the goldsmith's daughter, and knight Walter seek and find each other in the throng only to be separated by the boisterous and mischievous boys led by David, a jolly pupil of Hans Sachs. But the latter hears and recognizes their love songs, comes to the assistance of Walter and leads him to his fair one, giving them the place of honor at his side. Then again the air is rent with joyful shouts of greeting from the populace and the song of love re-echoes the feeling of exultation and good humor.

BROOKLYN, JAN. 31.—Having observed a paragraph in one of our Dailies, stating that Brooklyn is the home of the oldest organist in America, Mr. S. P. TAYLOR, I sought out his residence and made his acquaintance recently. Ninety-four numbers the years of his life, yet I found him in possession of his faculties to a remarkable extent. His memory of persons and of events, late, as well as early, is clear and accurate.

He was born in London, where his father was a clergyman. His musical instructors were Whitaker and Dr. Russell. He was on intimate terms with all the leading organists of London of seventy years ago, and being often called upon by them as temporary supply, early became familiar with the best instruments then known. He spoke of one organ which had three open diapasons, a remarkable feature at that period. "I am told" said he, "that some organs built of late have no stopped diapason. A builder or organist who approves of that omission, does not understand the first and most important use of that stop, which is to assist the open diapason to a quick response to the touch."

He heard Mad. Mara sing at a Lenten performance of the Messiah in Drury Lane, when she was eighty-six years old. He doubted if there was a dry eye in the house at the conclusion of her rendering of "He was despised."

If I remember rightly, he came to America during or about the time of the war of 1812. At any rate he was organist at St. Paul's (in Broadway, N. Y., just above Trinity church) in 1814, in which year he gave a musical performance there, a copy of the programme of which he showed me. I remember the name of Mr. Incledon solo vocalist, and also that of Mr. Gillingham, orchestral conductor, and who was the father of Mrs. Emma Gillingham Bostwick. Chanting was unknown in New York, if not in America, as a part of the Episcopal church service, until Mr. Taylor introduced it. At first it was harshly condemned by the clergy, with the exception of a few who had heard it in England.

About the year 1820 he went to Boston to reside, where for four or five years he was organist at the "West church," then under the pastoral care of Dr. Lowell. In 1826 he was organist at the Old South. He was much moved at the information that it is to be no longer used for religious purposes. While organist there he was giving music lessons to the daughter of the then Mayor, Josiah Quincy.

Meeting his Honor at home one day, he suggested to him the propriety of having some vocal music along with the other exercises, at the then approaching semi-centennial anniversary of the Declaration of Independence. The thought was a novel one to the Mayor. "But," said he, "I never talk of municipal matters in my house; come down to my of-fic." The result of the conference was an adoption of an

"ORDER OF SERVICES."

a copy of which lies before me, bearing the imprint of True and Green, and which I in part transcribe.

1. Voluntary and grand military introduction.
2. Solo and chorus. Stevenson. "Go forth to the mount." (words entire). 3. Prayer. 4. Solo. Haydn. In thee O Lord was our defence! (words entire). Cho.

*Sing his conquests, IMMORTAL WASHINGTON,
Sing his conquests, VICTORIOUS WASHINGTON.
He our mighty foes o'erthrew,
Ten thousand praises are his due.*

(an adaptation evidently of "Victorious David.") 5. Oration by Hon. Josiah Quincy. 6. Trio. Handel. "Disdainful of danger." Cho. Haydn. "Hallelujah to the God of Israel."

Mr. Taylor remembers his debates with the musical ones of the time, who, though they belonged to the Handel & Haydn Society, could see no good in the music of the first named. He told them they liked Haydn because they could sing him: they disliked Handel because they could not sing him. "Now," said he to them, "which like you best, roast beef, or roast veal?" "Why, we like both." "Just so exactly. Now the difference between Handel and Haydn is this: Handel wrote, making the voices express the words; Haydn wrote making the violins do that duty."

While in Boston he compiled a book of organ instructions, published by Badger. He found the purchaser for the first piano-forte made by Jonas Chickering, after he broke with Osborn and set up for himself. He gave harmony lessons by mail to the late Dr. Lowell Mason, then in Savannah. He spoke of the late Mr. Hayter as having done much to give Boston a liking for Handel. His last public appearance at the organ was in Trinity Church, N. Y., when a few years ago the chancel organ was opened.

In its proper place I omitted a reflection which I will make here. It was a singular coincidence that the music on that fiftieth anniversary of American Independence should be conducted by an Englishman, and in the very city and within the very walls around which cluster so many Revolutionary memories.

Should you agree with me that such a life and such services are worthy of passing recognition, even though it be but this mere mention, what I have written is at your service. W. T.

Matinees.

Messrs. HUGO LEONARD and JULIUS EICHBERG had a most successful opening of their fortnightly series of six matinees of classical piano and concerted music on Friday, Jan. 31, at the Wesleyan Hall (Bromfield Street), which was entirely filled with the best kind of audience. Will not a more spacious room be needed? The programme, choice in each particular, and of just the right length to be enjoyed without a feeling of satiety, was as follows:

Trio, C minor, op. 68.....Mendelssohn.
For Piano, Violin and Violoncello.
Allegro energico e con fuoco, Andante espressivo, Scherzo, Finale.
Hugo Leonard, Julius Eichberg and Wulf Fries.
a. Etude C sharp minor, op. 25, No. 7.....Chopin.
b. Capriccio op. 33, E major.....Mendelssohn.
Hugo Leonard.
Quintet, in E flat major, op. 44.....Schumann.
For Piano, 2 Violins, Viola and Cello.

Allegro brillante, in modo d'una Marcia, Scherzo,
Allegro ma non troppo.
Messrs. Leonhard, Eichberg, Mullaly, D. H. Suck, and Wulf Fries.

That Trio and that Quintet carried us back twenty years, to the very first concerts in this city of our townsman Otto Dresel, in the winter of 1852-3. For he it was who introduced them both to our acquaintance. The latter he played twice that season: first with the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, and a few weeks later in a concert of his own. It was in that memorable upper loft,—hall it could not be called,—just opposite the Tremont House. And how many choice creations, which have ever since been favorites in all our chamber concerts, first revealed their beauty here to the small knot of listeners in that "upper chamber!" From these evenings we date the first impressions also of the other Mendelssohn Trio; the Bach Concerto in D minor for three pianos (Jaell, Scharfenberg and Dresel); a four-hand Sonata by Hummel; another by Moscheles; Hummel's Septet (with Scharfenberg for pianist, Zerrahn, flute, Bergmann, 'cello, &c., &c.); several Beethoven Sonatas, both with violin and solo; numerous piano works of Bach, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Chopin; and the very first taste of the Franz songs, a dozen of them perhaps, sung by Miss Caroline Lehmann, as well as several by Schubert and by Schumann—all at that time new to us. So when we heard the Mendelssohn Trio and the Schumann Quintet played so admirably this time, we seemed to feel the present and the long past experience blended into one.

Certainly this time the Trio had all the fire and energy in the Allegro, all the expression in the Andante with its broad nine-eighths rhythm, all the fairy lightness in the Scherzo, and all the stirring full-chord choral grandeur in the Finale, that one could desire. The only drawback seemed due to the hall itself, which gave a certain thickness, overfullness without musical intensity, to the tones of the piano in strong passages. This was in a great measure obviated by Mr. Leonhard in his solos, where the tone was skilfully and delicately humored, with that fine tact which he possesses. The two pieces were happily contrasted; that serious, romantic, mystical, profoundly sad and tender Etude of Chopin, opening with a musing phrase of recitative in the bass, the whole expressed with truest feeling,—and the fresh, buoyant, rapid, healthful Mendelssohn Capriccio, which was new to us, and of which the unflagging, even movement was kept up as one would like to keep up one of the happy moods vouchsafed to all of us at times.

The wonderful Quintet by Schumann we have seen mentioned more than once during the past week as a work seldom heard in Boston. Too seldom heard no doubt; but since the period above alluded to, it was again played twice by the same parties in 1856; and since that time has reappeared about as often as most of the important compositions of its class,—and it was played in the concerts of these same gentlemen, at Mechanics' Hall, last winter. And always does it make a great impression. Few works are so exciting from the beginning to the end. It is all strong, clear, glowing, full of fire; nothing uncertain, patched up in its plan; no groping and struggling through chaotic vagueness of purpose; the spark comes, and the light, at every stroke; the climax never disappoints. The tremendous energy and brilliancy of the first and last movements is only just enough relieved by the protracted, ever new, imaginative variation of the funeral march, which seems to solemnize the obsequies of no person, but just to keep time to the whole mournful story of the night side of human life and history in general. On the part of all the artists it was capitally rendered; Mr. Eichberg's violin has rarely sounded better.

Of the next matinee, Feb. 14, the concerted pieces will be: the Trio in D minor by Schumann; Concerto for two violins, by Bach; and a Sonata of Beethoven for piano and violin, in G, op. 30, No. 8. For piano solos: "a Hebrew Melody" arranged by Franz, and several of Chopin's Preludes.

MME. ERMINIA RUDERSDORFF's three matinees, at Mechanics' Hall are concluded. They increased in interest as they went on. The programme of the second, Jan. 21, was this:

*Trio. No. 12. E flat.....Haydn.
Miss Mary Underwood, Miss Therese Liebe and Mr. Rudolph Hennig.
*Aria. "With trembling steps.".....J. S. Bach.
Miss Alice Fairman.
Violin obbligato: Miss Therese Liebe.
Pianoforte Solo. Transcription of Wagner's Spinnelled.....List.
Miss Mary Underwood.
Songs. Canzonet. "She never told her love." Haydn.
Allegro. "Vanne sorella ingrata." Handel.
From the Opera [Radamisto].
Lied. "Horch, horch die Lerch".....Schubert.
Mme. Erminia Rudersdorff.
*Song. "Love sounds th' alarm." (Acis and Galatea).....Handel.
Nelson Varley.
Duet. "Mira la blanca luna".....Rossini.
Mme. Rudersdorff and Mr. Varley.
Cradle Song. "Peacefully slumber".....A. Randegger.
Alice Fairman.
Violoncello obbligato: Rudolph Hennig.
Violin Solo.
*a. Adagio from the G minor Sonata.....Tartini.
*b. Scherzo.....Bazzini.
Therese Liebe.
Songs. a. "Hark how still".....Franz.
b. "While larks with little wings".....
Nelson Varley.
Part Song. "The sea hath its pearls".....Pisanti.
Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Fairman, Messrs. Varley and H. R. White.
At the Pianoforte, Mr. Apthorp.

The Haydn Trio, charmingly fresh and pure, was one of the new old things worth knowing. No question whether that were "music," could arise in any mind:—a question which seems never to get settled with regard to most of the productions of the present day. It was quite well rendered, charmingly on the part of Miss LIEBE and Mr. HENNING, clearly, strongly, but somewhat too heavily, on that of the pianist; nor was that young lady, earnest and devoted as she is, quite in her best mood for List's difficult transcription. Of the violin solos, the Adagio by Tartini was a truly lovely strain of noble and sustained cantabile out of a sincere period of music. Next to Bach and Handel, those old violin masters,—and they are quite as genuine, if more limited—seem to have had the best of it. What more worthy or rewarding task (artistically) than to revive their works for souls and senses jaded by so much of modern sentimentalism and mere striving for effect? The truly musical young lady played it with pure style and truth of feeling. The Scherzo by Bazzini was a bright and happy bit of virtuosity. The feebleness of tone complained of in her Music Hall performance is no longer felt.

Mme. RUDERSDORFF had the accommodating and refined accompaniment of Mr. LANE in her triplet of songs. Haydn's beautiful and touching Canzonet was a welcome revival of what was once one of the cherished musical household blessings, and was sung with great expression. The Handel Allegro, a magnificent outburst of indignant passion,—one of the Arias unearthed from his Italian Opera scores by Franz,—a swift, devouring flame of passion, was given with tremendous, thrilling energy. Schubert's Shakespeare song: "Hark, the Lark!",—a perfect musical expression of the ecstatic spirit of the words,—would have sounded better in English; "arise! arise!" rings clearer than "steh auf!" The reason for singing it in German was, that the German version has an added stanza; would not the same end have been better answered by repeating it in the original? It was a rather childish English ballad with which Madame responded to the encore with winning heartiness of manner, accompanying herself with a musical, true touch on the piano.

The Bach Aria: "With trembling steps," from one of the church Cantatas, arranged by Franz,—there's "melody" for you, and "richness!"—was sung in a rich, large, sympathetic voice, and with a right conception, if not with quite warmth enough by Miss FAIRMAN, and the accompanying violin obligato was beautifully played by Miss Liebe; not altogether so the pianoforte part, which, leaving out that prominent and golden thread inwoven in the Franz accompaniment, gave only what was left of the harmonic texture, without the unity the part should have in itself; and that too in a manner not most reassuring to the singer. Nevertheless this Aria was one of the things the most enjoyed that afternoon. The "Cradle Song," by Randegger, of a more common sentimental order, suited Miss Fairman's voice, whose singing it is a luxury to listen to in whatever melody she feels at home in.

Mr. VARLEY sang his way into still new favor by his heroic, ringing, musically sweet and clear delivery of the air from Acis and Galatea. Phrasing and declamation were admirable; vocalization likewise; and the strong high tones came out clear and satisfactory. In the songs by Franz the singer is not yet so well at home. The Rossini Duet went charmingly. The Italian Piusuti part-song might have come from English Glee-man Dr. Calcott.

The third Matinée, on Tuesday of this week, offered the following programme:

- Quartet. No. 1, in F, op. 18.....Beethoven.
Therese Liebe and Mendelssohn Quintet Club. ♀
*Aria. "Del mio dolce ardor".....Stradella.
Alice Fairman.
*Scena ed Aria. "Bella mia fiamma, addio".....Mozart.
Nelson Varley.
Pianoforte Solo. "Fastnachts Schwank".....Schumann.
Mary Underwood.
*Aria. "Crucifixus," Messe Solennelle.....Rossini.
[Cabinet Organ obligato].
Mme. Erminia Rudersdorff.
Duet. "Fuor d'periglio," from the opera "Floridante".....Handel.
Mme. Rudersdorff and Mr. Varley.
Violin Soli. { a. Tristesse.....Hauser.
b. Serenade.....Haydn.
c. Bourree.....Handel.
Therese Liebe.
Song. "The Requit".....Blumenthal.
Nelson Varley.
Lieder.
a. Wenn drueben die Glocken klingen.....Franz.
b. Suleika (op. 57).....Mendelssohn.
Mme. Rudersdorff.
Solo for Contralto. "The Naiad," [by desire].
Anton Rubinstein.
With accompaniment of Female Voices.
Alice Fairman.

The Fräulein LILSE (who looked as if she might be a relation of the Violin), led the Beethoven Quartet with precision, spirit and expression in the first three movements, her intonation being very pure and phrasing excellent, and her collocutors, Messrs. SCHULTZE, RYAN and HENNIG were of course quite equal to their parts in the melodic conversation. But by the beginning of the Finale, which is a trying piece, she showed too clear signs of fatigue, having been ill for several days. The Aria by Stradella, (new to us) is a rich strain of noble, heartfelt melody, and was sung by Miss Fairman in a style absolutely enjoyable, every tone being both large and purely musical in quality. We had never heard her to so great advantage.

Another of the Mozart Concert Arias for the first time! Mozart composed it for a Soprano, Mme. Dnscheck, who was obliged to lock him up in a garden house before he could be induced to write it out; and when it was done he refused to give it to her unless she sang it all correctly at first sight. A pretty severe test for a singer, since there are sequences in it in wide chromatic intervals that do not sing themselves. The words, however, are those of a despairing lover about to die at the bidding of a cold mistress, and therefore natural to a male voice. Mr. Varley gave the recitative with fine expression, but labored too perceptibly through some of the perplexing passages. Yet it is a very noble Scena, and the middle Andante strain is in the pure vein of Mozart melody.—The title of the piano solo should probably have read: "Fastings-Schwank," or Viennese Carnival, for it could have little to do with any "Fast Night." Miss UNDERWOOD did not appear, to play it; the substitution of the not very musical Hallet and Davis for a Chickering piano may very likely have discouraged her. The Crucifixus from Rossini's Mass was very impressive; Mme. Rudersdorff sang it in her largest and best voice and style.

Perhaps the most thoroughly novel and delightful thing upon the programme was the Duet from one of Handel's operas,—again with a Franz accompaniment, full of a quaint cooing figure, and the two-fold melody most graceful, light and airy. It went to a charm, in spite of the questionable transposition of the voices. After this Mme. Rudersdorff, suffering from a painful ear-ache, was obliged to desist from singing. In the place of her two Lieder, Miss Fairman sang a song by Benedict to great acceptance. Miss Liebe had recovered strength sufficiently to play her three little violin solos very charmingly; the rollicking and healthy Handel Bourree, short and sweet, was most enlivening. Mr. Varley sang "The Requit" very tenderly and sweetly, giving the best specimen we have had of his more delicate, romance-like style; heretofore it has been the heroic and dramatic. The "Naiad" piece did not impress us quite so agreeably as it did the first time, nor did it go so well.—And so closed a series of concerts, unique in some respects, singularly rich in classical, rare things attempted for the first time here, and surely rich in the interpreters.

Apollo versus Beethoven!

Our friend of Harper's "Easy Chair" has enjoyed many a good Symphony with us in days which we remember, and which he has glowingly described. But now the genial old gentleman seems more inclined to dance. Leaving his un-easy chair, in strange bewilderment, he wanders to the Boston Music Hall, to seek that pleasure in a classical Symphony Concert! Did he ever think of going to a New York "Philharmonic" for his "Blue Danube"? We fear his wits were wandering, (for verily there is no wit in his elaborate satire which we copy in another column,—at least we can find none, and so we give it to our readers that they may try their wits upon it). Probably the mere name of Symphony, by force of old association, caught his fancy as he hastened to the hall expecting a new Symphony by Strauss. But "se vuol ballare Signor Contino," if his Honor wants to dance, there are plenty of Figaros to "sound the guitar" for him; any Gilmore can do that; why turn to a Symphony Concert for it? Coming out from the Hall, the dear old fellow, whose sympathies of course are all with youth, becomes the confidant of some callow dancing beau, or maiden on the eve of "coming out," and sinking with a sigh into the hard old Chair again, proceeds to discuss the Concert from their point of view,—as if all concerts ought to be "forbidden" which are not designed exclusively for them!

He joins in the cry against "this Bach fashion," after listening to the only piece of Bach that thus far has been given this whole winter; and that a simple Cradle Song, a sweet and lovely melody, all melody, alike in the voice part and in each accompanying instrument. For this is the character of all Bach's music; long, flowing melodies he always has; his harmony itself is all melodious, an intertwining and embracing of melodious parts; not one melody with a tedious tum-ti-tum guitar accompaniment. Unfortunately Bach is not in fashion here, and never was; fashion is not apt to be enamored of anything so sound and healthy, so steadfast and enduring. Art versus Fashion, the intrinsically True and Beautiful versus the caprices of a shallow clique, the fashions and the whimsies of a season,—that, in music, is the very end and aim of Symphony or Philharmonic Concerts. There is no lack of provision, ever, for the lighter, miscellaneous music. Every musical showman, every speculator in public amusements, looks out for that. The only music which gets no chance amid their eager competition, unless the earnest friends thereof build up some permanent establishment for it, jealously guarding its full rights in its own proper programmes, is the so-called "classical" or model music,—the music, of whose beauty, genius, excellence there cannot be a doubt. Should that go down amid the waves and freshets of "fashion" and frivolity, where would taste find any standard? Or rather, what would become of taste after a long miscellaneous cramming with sweet-meats and confectionery?

Our uneasy friend furnishes us with some good catchwords for texts, if we had room to enter fully into the discussion. "Melody forbidden in the Music Hall" is one. Surely he does not need to be told that there is melody enough in Haydn and Mozart,—their symphonies as well as in their songs. Of Bach we have already spoken. And so of all the greatest orchestral composers; every one of them is full of melody; not commonplace and sentimental; and the melody is "treated," so set and illustrated by all the means of art that it can never become hackneyed. The gradual and sure discovery of this is one great part of the delight of those who loyally attend and listen to a series of such concerts.

Then as to "light" and "heavy" music. A good composition is like good bread; it is well risen, "light," digestible. It is because of this very excellence that the classical works please generation after generation of those whose appetites have not been cloyed and spoiled by sweetmeats, and the heavy cake and hot bread that are as lead upon the stomach. "Heavy music!" Is there anything so heavy as some of the new music with which the craving after novelty has tantalized itself of late?

How many "Symphonic Poems" would it take to make one confirmed musical dyspeptic? Now what these monstrous, huge effect pieces of Liszt and Berlioz do in one way, is done in another way by all these miscellaneous feasts and cramming of so-called light and brilliant music. What a fatiguing as a programme without tone or plan, without consistency or symmetry, where each thing that we hear wipes out the whole impression of the last, and we are haunted afterwards only by scraps of melody out of a bewildering babel and confusion of tongues?

But really our Howadij's brain is getting morbid, mystical, deranged, when he begins to rave about a "rod of iron" and the "inquisition" and the trembling worship of the "brazen giant," meaning Crawford's Beethoven, who stands there just as much a type of the eternal youth of genius, as the Apollo at the opposite end of the hall. We will not attempt to follow him and reason with him in those wild hallucinations. It must be that there was some juvenile roguery in those young friends of his, and that they stuffed his Chair full of pins; for he talks like one awaking from bad dreams.

When he summons "Apollo," however, as an antidote to his grim tyrant Beethoven, and to the dreadful name [for it is name alone] of Bach, we are tempted to suggest that, if Apollo be the god of Poetry and Art, the genius of immortal youth, where will he find more true and splendid homage than in the music of the mighty master? And, looking from one statue to the other while the Symphony goes on, who can help feeling that between those two, at least, there must be perfect sympathy and understanding?

Mr. Richard Hoffman's Concert.

The first of a series of three chamber concerts was given by Mr. Hoffman on Saturday evening at Chickering's Hall. Mr. Hoffman is peculiarly fortunate in his surroundings. He has, in the first place, the best, handsomest, and most tastefully fitted concert room in the city, of exactly the right size for chamber music, and perfect in its acoustics. He has the assistance, as was the case also last winter, of two exceptionally good artists, Mr. Burke and Mr. Bergner; and his list of subscribers comprises a little circle in close sympathy with the class of music presented, and many of them in kindly relations with the giver of the concert. This last is no slight matter, for a friendly and sympathetic audience is much more inspiring to the player than a random audience listening in an indifferent and cold mood.

The programme was unexceptionably good, and consisted of the following selections:

- Schubert's B flat trio, op. 90.
Handel's second concerto.
Mendelssohn's duo for piano and violoncello.
Andante and Polonaise, op. 22, Chopin.
Four songs of Schumann—the voice part played by violin.
"Les Clochettes," and arrangement from "Crispin."

The strongest pieces were, of course, the Schubert and the Mendelssohn compositions. Schubert wrote but two trios, but those were composed when he was in the fullest and freest exercise of his great powers, and both mark the high tide of his genius. They are numbered 99 and 100, and though the latter is the work of the highest inspiration, the one played on Saturday evening is but little inferior in grace of melody and freedom of treatment. It was played with exquisite feeling and unity by the three musicians. Those who were also present at the Rubinstein chamber concert, at which this same trio was given, will not have failed to notice the different coloring that it received on the two occasions. Especially, the last movement was taken by Rubinstein at a tempo almost double that which Hoffman gave to it. But Rubinstein is much too often at the full gallop. His impetuosity of nature combined with his prodigious technique sometimes carries away his judgment, and in certain movements allowing of rapidity he loses himself upon the keyboard like a whirlwind. The effect is exciting certainly, but it is to be doubted whether it is the effect that the composer aimed at. The calmer and more equal interpretation that Mr. Hoffman gave to this particular movement is, we believe, to be preferred.

The Schumann songs were beautifully rendered by Mr. Burke with the true spirit and emotion. To deprive such lovely songs as these of the equally lovely words of Rückert, Eichendorf, and Heine, is of course a great loss to them, nor is the violin, even when so delightfully played, an equivalent for the voice; but they are better so than in the hands of any but a first-rate singer.

Mr. Hoffman's solos were especially interesting. He played Agnes Zimmermann's arrangement of the Harpsichord concerto, Handel's "Harmonious Blacksmith," Chopin's Polonaise, Gottschalk's "Murmures Éoliennes," and two of his own compositions, the latter being the Crispino arrangement, which, with the exception of certain of Liszt's, we have always considered the most brilliant and effective arrangement of operatic airs ever put together. He played with finish, delicacy and fire, such as we do not remember to have heard him excel on any previous occasion.—N. Y. Sun.

Music Abroad.

OPERA IN GERMANY.—It may be interesting to our readers to see the repertoire of some of the principal German theatres,—say from the second week in October to the second week in December, 1872, later than which our files do not reach. We have been analyzing the lists of operas performed during those two months in a dozen German cities, as given in the Signale, mainly with a view to ascertaining what composers and what pieces are just now most in vogue there, and with the following result.

BERLIN. Mozart: Zauberoeete 4 times, Don Juan 2, Nozze di Figaro 2, Così fan Tutte 2, Die Entführung (Seraglio) 1.—Wagner: Lohengrin 4, Tannhauser 2, Rienzi 2. Meyerbeer: Robert 2, Huguenots 1, Prophet 2, Africaine 2.—Flotow: Stradella 4, Martha.—Auber: Lac des Fées, Le Magon, Domino Noir.—Weber: Freyschuetz 2.—Cherubini: Medea 2.—Gounod: Faust 2.—Maz Bruch: Hermoline 2.—Verdi: Trovatore.—Halevy: Jewess; Gluck: Orpheus; Mehul: Joseph; Bellini: Norma; Beethoven: Fidelity; Rossini: Barber; Lortzing: Czar and Zimmermann; Boieldieu: White Lady.

VIENNA.—Mozart: Così fan Tutte 4, Figaro 2, Don Juan, Entführung, Zauberoeete.—Wagner: Lohengrin 3, Rienzi 2, Meistersinger 2, Tannhauser, Flying Dutchman.—Meyerbeer: Africaine 3, Prophet 2, Robert, Huguenots.—Weber: Abu Hassan 5, Freyschuetz.—Verdi: Ballo in Maschera 4, Trovatore, Rigoletto.—Schubert: Hausliche Krieg 5.—Donizetti: Favorita 2, Lucrezia 2, Lucia.—Gounod: Romeo and Juliet 2, Faust.—Bellini: Norma 3; Halevy: Jewess; Niccolai: Merry Wives; Gluck: Armida; Thomas: Mignon; Adam: Postillon 2; Marschner: Hans Helling.

DRESDEN. Wagner: Lohengrin 3, Rienzi 2, Tannhauser 2, Flying Dutchman 2, Meistersinger 2.—Meyerbeer: Prophet 3, Robert.—Mozart: Zauberoeete 3.—Beethoven: Fidelity 2.—Weber: Freyschuetz 2.—Auber: Crown Diamonds 2; Marschner: Templar und Judin; Gounod: Faust; Gluck: Armida; Grisar: Bon Soir M. Pantalón; Flotow: Martha.

MUNICH. Auber: Le Part du Diable, Masaniello, Domino Noir.—Weber: Freyschuetz 2; Mozart: Zauberoeete 2; Gluck: Orpheus 2; Mehul: Joseph 2; Rossini: Tell; Gounod: Faust; von Holstein: Die Haldenschacht; Flotow:

Stradella; Schubert: Hausliche Krieg; Cherubini: Medea; Wagner: Tannhauser; Beethoven: Fidelity; Meyerbeer: Africaine.

LEIPZIG. Mozart: Così fan Tutte 2, Zauberoeete 2.—Lortzing: Undine, Waffenschmied, Die beiden Schützen. Wagner: Tannhauser, Lohengrin.—Meyerbeer: Huguenots, Africaine.—Weber: Euryanthe 2; Niccolai: Merry Wives 2; Beethoven: Fidelity; Marschner: Vampyr; Boieldieu: White Lady; Thomas: Hamlet; Donizetti: Lucia; Flotow: Martha.

COLOGNE. Mozart: Don Juan 2, Figaro.—Gounod: Faust 3.—Weber: Freyschuetz 2; Rossini: Tell 2; Halevy: Jewess 2; Verdi: Trovatore 2; Lortzing: Waffenschmied 2; Niccolai: Merry Wives 2.—Beethoven: Fidelity; Donizetti: Fille du Regiment; Flotow: Martha; Boieldieu: White Lady; Auber: Masaniello.

WEIMAR. Auber: Part du Diable, Masaniello, Fra Diavolo.—Wagner: Lohengrin, Meistersinger.—Meyerbeer: Robert, Africaine.—Rossini: Barber, Tell.—Adam: Postillon 2; Halevy: Jewess; Mehul: Joseph; Mozart: Figaro; Lortzing: Undine; Boieldieu: Jean de Paris.

HAMBURG. (Sept. and Oct.) Auber: Fra Diavolo 4, Masaniello 3, Crown Diamonds 3.—Offenbach (!): Fritzchen und Lieschen 3, Princesse de Trebizond 5, M. et Mme. Denis 2.—Wagner: Lohengrin 4, Tannhauser, 4.—Suppe: Die schone Galatea 5.—Donizetti: Fille du Regiment 3, Lucia 2.—Meyerbeer: Huguenots 4, Africaine.—Weber: Freyschuetz 4.—Halevy: Jewess 4.—Mozart: Don Juan 2, Zauberoeete.—Lortzing: Waffenschmied 2, Czar und Zimmermann.—Beethoven: Fidelity 2; Flotow: Martha 2; Gounod: Faust 2; Kreutzer: Nachtlager 2; Verdi: Trovatore 2; Rossini: Barber; Bellini: Sonnambula; Herold: Zampa; Boieldieu: White Lady.

BRESLAU. Meyerbeer: Huguenots 3, Africaine 5.—Beethoven: Fidelity 5.—Weber: Freyschuetz 4; Halevy: Jewess 4; Verdi: Rigoletto 3, Trovatore; Boieldieu: White Lady 3; Lortzing: Waffenschmied 2; Rossini: Barber; Offenbach: Barbe-Blue.

FRANKFORT. Verdi: Ballo in Maschera 3; Lortzing: Undine 2; Halevy: Jewess; Auber: Masaniello; Weber: Freyschuetz; Kreutzer: Nachtlager; Donizetti: Fille du Regiment; Mozart: Zauberoeete.

CARLSRUHE and BADEN-BADEN.—Beethoven: Fidelity 2; Auber: Fra Diavolo 2; Gounod: Faust 2; Meyerbeer: Prophet, Robert; Spohr: Jessonda.

CASSEL. Verdi: Trovatore, Rigoletto; Flotow: Stradella; Donizetti: L'Elisir; Wagner: Rienzi; Kreutzer: Nachtlager; Beethoven: Fidelity; Mozart: Zauberoeete; Lortzing: Czar und Zimmermann; Spohr: Jessonda; Herold: Zampa; Gluck: Orpheus.

The various composers figure in the above list as follows: Wagner 42 times, Mozart 38, Meyerbeer 38, Weber 26, Auber 26, Verdi 21, Beethoven 16, Lortzing 15, Gounod 14, Halevy 14, Donizetti 14, Offenbach 11, Flotow 11, Rossini 8, Boieldieu 8, Gluck 6, Schubert 6, Bellini 5, Suppe 5, Mehul 4, Cherubini 3, Niccolai 3, Marschner 3, &c.

Of the Operas most frequently performed, Der Freyschuetz heads the list, appearing 18 times. Then follow: Fidelity 16, Lohengrin 16, Zauberoeete 15, L'Africaine 14, Jewess 14, Faust 12, Tannhauser 11, Huguenots 10, Trovatore 9, Così fan Tutte, Don Juan 7, Rienzi 7, White Lady 7, Ballo in Maschera 7, Schubert's Hausliche Krieg 6, Nozze di Figaro 6, Meistersinger 5, Robert 5, Prophet 5, Abou Hassan 5, Gluck's Orpheus 4, Joseph 4, &c.

PARIS. At the third Conservatoire Concert, Dec. 29 (honored by the presence of M. Thiers), Schumann's music to Byron's Manfred was given for the first time in Paris entire:—Overture, entr'actes, choruses, Raus des Vaches, &c. The other selections were Mozart's Symphony in C; Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Bach; the Chant élégiaque of Beethoven; and Mendelssohn's Overture to Ruy Blas.

M. Padeloup's Popular Concert on the same day, at the Winter Circus, offered: Overture to Athalie, Mendelssohn; Romance from Haydn's Symphony "de la Reine"; Beethoven's 7th Symphony; Prelude of Bach, orchestrated by Gounod; Weber's Invitation, orch. by Berlioz.—The programme for Jan. 5 was as follows: March, by Meyerbeer; Symphony in E flat, Mozart; Reverie, Schumann; Beethoven's C-minor Concerto, played by M. Th. Ritter; Overture to Les Francs-Juges, Berlioz.

At the Opera, the repertoire for November comprised: Il Trovatore, Faust, Don Juan 3 times, La Juive 3, Le Prophète, La Traviata.

At the Opera Comique (Dec.): La Dame Blanche 2, Nozze di Figaro 2, Mignon, L'Ombre (Flotow) 3, Le Pré aux Clercs (Herold) 2, Haydee (Auber) 2, Les Dragons de Villars (Mallart) 2, La Chalet (Adam), Don Cesar de Basan (Massenet).

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

- Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.
- The Passing Ship. 3. C to f. Gabriel. 40
"A strange ship loomed before me,
And I cried: a sail! a sail!"
The poetic thoughts suggested by a ship passing in the night. Words by the Earl of Pembroke.
- Angel Child. 3. C to f. Gabriel. 40
"An angel with a radiant face Above a cradle knelt."
It is sufficient to say that the poem is by Longfellow, and the music beautiful, like the words.
- None but I can say. 2. G to e. M. F. H. Smith. 30
"And how I loved her then and there None but I can say."
A very sweet love song.
- My Darling's Shoes. 3. G to e. Porter. 30
"God bless the little feet.
That never go astray."
- Dreams. 3. C to g. Molloy. 30
"The moonlight glitters on the deep,
The gray sea-birds have flown to their sleep."
Dreaming to purpose in a most musical manner.
- Dance on Forever. (Linden Waltz Song). 3. Aida. 30
G to e.
"Floating with pleasure Unto that measure."
The accompaniment is a waltz, and voice and instrument whirl along very gracefully together.
- Hope's Sun will shine again. 3. G to f. Sanderson. 30
"O, give not way to sorrow, love."
Words by Finley Johnson. Good sentiment and good music.
- Voices of the Past. 3. C to c. Gatty. 30
"You wonder that my tears should flow."
Adelaide Proctor wrote it. A fine ballad.
- Guess if you can. Lithograph title. 2. F to f. Pratt. 40
"O always of him I've been dreaming."
A very well turned serio-comic song.
- The Day when you'll forget me. For Guitar. 3. Thomas. 40
E to e.
Well known favorite song.
Note.—There is not room in these columns to notice them, but arrangements of almost all favorite songs are made for Guitar.
- Farewell! 3. E♭ to a. Warren. 30
"When hands are linked that dread to part,
And heart is met by throbbing heart."
A fine concert song, full of power and pathos.
- When we met on the sly. Song and dance. 3. Schleiffarth. 30
C to g.
Comic, with a bright dance.
- Emerald. 3. G to e. Gabriel. 35
"Mavourneen! Mavourneen! I feel the wild sorrow."
A beautiful Irish song; no brogue to it, but good words and music.
- Instrumental.
- Strauss Dance Music.
Under this general title are published a number of the best Strauss pieces, the music somewhat condensed, and therefore afforded at a less price than usual. Of these we name, this week:
- Dragon Fly Polka Max. From the Mountain Waltz.
Singer's Joy Polka. Mme. Leutner's Polka.
Spiral Waltzes. Vibration Waltzes.
Will o' the Wisp W'tz. Travelling Incidents W'tzes.
Price of each piece 25
- Melodie in F. Illustrated Title. 4. F. Rubinstein. 40
Rubinstein contrives to put a great deal of meaning into this piece without making it too difficult for common players.
- Awfully Clever Waltz. 3. E♭. Lyle. 30
A popular comic song neatly arranged as a waltz. Very taking.
- The Danube River. Transcription. 4. G. B. Richards. 40 Extremely graceful rendering of the widely known melody.
- Vision of the Past. (Vision du Passé). 4. E♭. Ganz. 75 Beautiful theme, with the usual graceful changes of arpeggios running from right to left hand, runs, trills, &c. A very satisfying piece.
- Autumn Leaves. Op. 40. 3. G. Wilson. 75
When a person hears this piece, he is very apt to turn his head and remark to a friend "that is pretty music!" It is that; smooth, graceful and easy.
- ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

[Translated from the French for Dwight's Journal of Music.]

I.

In the month of February, 1751, the Rue Neuve-Saint-Roch was all alive with the preparations for a fête to be given that same night at a fine hotel situated not far from the middle of that street. This hotel, which had a second entrance on the Rue de la Sourdière, was that of the celebrated farmer-general, Jean-Joseph Leriche de la Popelinière. Many years previously he had repudiated his first name, Leriche, fearing no doubt that it might be taken for a nick-name, and had slightly altered his second by dropping a letter; he then remained the Sieur de la Popelinière, and he might also have added, as did the financier Zamet, lord of several hundred millions of crowns.

The grand fête about to be celebrated at his hotel was an anniversary, not of his birth, still less of his marriage, but that of his deliverance; so, at least, was he accustomed to call the day corresponding to a period already three years distant, but which had been signalized by a most scandalous adventure, with which all Paris had been amused. This was the famous story of the fire-place with a revolving front, by means of which the Marshal de Richelieu introduced himself into the chamber of Mme. de la Popelinière, while her husband was keeping her carefully locked up in order to withdraw her from the intrigues of the gallant marshal. M. de la Popelinière had, it must be acknowledged, married his wife reluctantly, and in circumstances little calculated to make him bless the chain which bound him.

Notwithstanding the publicity of his conjugal disgrace, he did not give up his mode of life, but continued to receive in his salon all the celebrities in literature, science and art, and all the ornaments of the nobility and of the legal and military professions. But every year, on the anniversary of his separation, he gave a most splendid fête, and it was of the preparations for one of these fêtes that we spoke at the beginning of this story.

One of the chief attractions of the soirées of M. de la Popelinière was the excellent music to be heard there. At that time musical reunions were a rarity, and those at the Hôtel de la Popelinière were of a splendor to which it would be in vain to seek a parallel in our times. Rameau, the greatest French musician of the eighteenth century, was then at the zenith of his glory, and Rameau owed everything to M. de la Popelinière. It was the generous financier who had assisted him to take the first steps in a career, which up to his fiftieth year he had not been able to enter upon. It was M. de la Popelinière who had advanced to Rameau the six hundred livres in consideration of which the Abbé Pellegrin had consented to entrust to him his poem Hippolyte et Aricie; it was at M.

de la Popelinière's house that the first trials were made of this first opera of Rameau; it was owing to the protection of M. de la Popelinière that it was received, rehearsed and performed, and the gratitude of the artist never failed for a single moment during his whole life. The financier, on his part, was proud of his protégé, as he had a right to be. In order to facilitate the rendering of all Rameau's compositions, the first hearing of which was always reserved for him, M. de la Popelinière had at his command a full corps of musicians, chorus and solo singers, the whole expense of which amounted to not less than thirty thousand livres a year; but the pleasure and honor which this great outlay afforded him were such that they seemed to him to be cheaply purchased.

On this occasion a new opera by Rameau was to be performed. It was in one act and was entitled La Guirlande. The first performance at the Opera was not to take place until some months later, and this early hearing was all the more attractive as the period when the work was to be made public was somewhat remote. Several rehearsals had already taken place, none of them satisfactory to Rameau, whose music was very difficult to execute. The previous evening he had spoken sharply to the first violin, who also filled the post of conductor, and to the harpsichord player, the accompanist, who had not been able to catch one of the changes of movement so frequent in his music. At last, in despair, he carried off the score in order to change the passage, appointing a general rehearsal at nine o'clock the next morning. The musicians were punctual to their appointment, but at ten o'clock the conductor, the accompanist, and the composer had not yet appeared. Tired of waiting, they applied to M. de la Popelinière, who hastened to send a messenger to Rameau's house. The messenger returned, saying that M. Rameau had replied begging them to wait for him, and requesting that no one should quit his post. While the musicians were complaining of the time they were losing, and scattering themselves over the hotel to observe the preparations for the fête, let us look in upon the belated composer.

Rameau lived in the Rue du Chantre Saint-Honoré, occupying the first story of a rather inferior house. He was fond of this dwelling, first, because he had lived in it for twenty years, and also because the street, too narrow for vehicles, was for that reason a very quiet one, although in a fashionable and noisy quarter, quite near the door of the Opera, then situated in the Palais-Royal. Rameau had passed the night in going over the score of La Guirlande, seeking in vain to simplify the passages which had been like so many dangerous rocks, on which the performers, whom he had accused, not altogether without reason, of ignorance and incompetency, had foundered. Rameau was then sixty-eight years old. After gaining a great reputation as organist and harpsichordist, he had given to the world, in 1733, when he had reached the age of fifty, his first opera. He must have laid up an ample store of melodies during the half-century he had spent in meditating upon his first work, for it was followed by twenty other operas, all of which had the most brilliant success, bringing about an entire revolution in music, and elevating to the highest point the fame of their author. It is easy to believe that, having produced so much, and years beginning to weigh upon him, the later compositions of Rameau were not written with the same facility as the first; he clung also with tenacity to his ideas, he combined slowly and with calculation. Accordingly he resolved to change nothing, hoping that by dint of care he should succeed at the rehearsal in surmounting the difficulties before which they had come to a stand-still the previous night. It was half-past eight, and he was about making ready to repair to the Rue Neuve-Saint-Roch, when a note just brought was handed to him. Scarcely had he glanced over it when he turned pale and sank, as if crushed, into an arm-chair standing in front of his harpsichord.

Here are the contents of the letter:

"MONSIEUR:—One may have great talent and yet be polite. This is what you are utterly ignorant of. You told me yesterday that I did not know my business because I could not play your music. I might reply that you do not know yours, since you write only such uncouth music that it is impossible to play it. But I prefer to put up with the injustice you have done me. I acknowledge that I know nothing, and that I am unworthy of participating in the execution of your sublime compositions. Consequently, I have the honor to inform you that you need no longer count upon me nor upon our usual accompanist, who improves this opportunity to send you his resignation with my own.

"Signed: GUIGNON,
"Ex-first violin of the musicians of M. de la Popelinière."

In order to understand the blow struck by this missive, we must carry ourselves back to the period when professional musicians were so scarce, that the salaries of the first singers of the Opera were not greater by more than one half than those of the artists of the orchestra. To think of replacing the first violin and the harpsichordist would have been folly, and Rameau saw that the performance of his music had become impossible. He believed himself ruined, dishonored. All Paris was counting upon this concert; M. de la Popelinière had announced it to all his friends, to all his guests, and the splendor of the fête would be compromised, it would be a failure, and all through his, Rameau's, fault. He, who had been loaded with benefits by M. de la Popelinière, might be accused of negligence or lack of good will. And no way of escape from this dreadful position! The poor musician abandoned himself to the most violent despair. He was so absorbed in his gloomy reflections that the bell, rung timidly at his door, failed to rouse him from his reverie. However, the bell continued to sound in crescendo; by degrees it reached fortissimo, and was rung with such desperate force that Rameau was at last roused from his pre-occupation by the incessant noise, and hastened himself to open the door.

He saw there before him a very small young man scarcely eighteen years old, fresh, rosy, and with a smiling and intelligent countenance.

"Were you asleep, Monsieur?" said the new comer. "Lucky your bell is strong; if every body who comes has to ring it so hard it will soon be worn out."

"Whom do you want?" replied Rameau with a look quite as unpleasant as his interlocutor's was lively.

"I want M. Rameau."

"Well, I am M. Rameau."

In an instant the countenance of the little man entirely changed; an expression of respect and admiration immediately replaced his jovial and somewhat mocking smile.

"Oh! monsieur," he cried, "pardon me for speaking to you in such a manner. I was far enough from suspecting that I saw before me a man whom I have been accustomed to admire ever since I have known and studied his works. I am a giddy fellow, monsieur; perhaps you were at work and I have disturbed you. Excuse me; permit me to retire, and tell me when I may return without being troublesome."

So much sincerity, such genuine admiration and respect were manifest in his air and in his language, that, although accustomed to homage, Rameau could not but be touched by the almost supplicating attitude of the young man.

"No, my friend," he said, "I was not at work, and you do not disturb me. But probably you have not come merely to pay me compliments; let me know the object of your visit."

"This letter will tell you!" replied the young man, handing to Rameau a carefully sealed paper, and while the great musician was looking into it, his eyes searched with avidity all the recesses of the apartment. It seemed as if he might be in a sanctuary, with so much love and respect did he dwell upon the smallest details; but what especially attracted his attention was the harpsichord, upon the desk of which lay open the score of La Guirlande. Meanwhile Rameau read the letter aloud:

"MONSIEUR:—My name is too obscure to be known to you, so I shall sign this letter only with my title of Chapel-master of the Cathedral of Antwerp. I take the liberty of sending to you one of my pupils, the best I have had or shall probably ever have. Young Gossec is now eighteen years old. He is the son of some poor peasants in a little village of Hainaut, who sent him to Antwerp as choir-boy when he was but seven years of age. His progress in music and composition has been so rapid, that for a long time I have been unable to teach him anything more. Only such a master as you can suit such a pupil. Permit me to entreat for him your instructions to perfect him in his art, and your protection during his entrance upon a career in which you have acquired so much glory, and in which he may one day hold an honorable place.

"The Chapel-master of Antwerp Cathedral."

"Well, my friend," said Rameau, "tell me what I can do for you, I am quite disposed to be useful to you. Let us see, what do you know? Are you singer or performer?"

"Mon Dieu! monsieur," replied Gossec, "since I lost my childish voice I can no longer sing, but I can play the violin, harpsichord and organ, and I intend to become a composer, having studied in your works the theory whose practice I have so much admired in your operas. I can not only figure in an orchestra, but can conduct it, that having been my employment in the cathedral at Antwerp."

"Indeed!" said Rameau, "can you understand a score without studying it some time in advance?"

"Certainly, monsieur, and if you will allow me to make the trial before you, I will engage to read on the harpsichord any score you may please to give me."

"That one now on the harpsichord, for example?"

Without replying, Gossec seated himself at the instrument, and without hesitation began playing at sight the score of La Guirlande, at the place where it lay open.

The art of playing and of reducing a score was then one of the rarest, and few musicians were capable of doing it; Rameau's admiration was equalled only by his joy at so unexpected an adventure.

"Good," said he, interrupting the young man, "do not go any farther. How do you construe this passage?" And turning over the leaves he pointed with his finger to the place where the musicians had stopped the previous night.

"Nothing is more simple," said Gossec; "there are in succession three changes of time, that is one division of so many notes to the beat. One measure in 4-4 time, one in 2-4 time, and one in 3-2. First there is one crochet to the beat for the first measure, then two crochets to the beat for the other two; the movement does not change, it is only the rhythm and the division."

"There! that was what those asses would not understand," cried Rameau, "and," he added in a lower tone, "it is just what I did not know how to explain to them. I have found my conductor. What a pity," he added, "that you cannot conduct the orchestra and accompany on the harpsichord at the same time! But where shall we find an accompanist of equal ability?"

"You want an accompanist?" said Gossec.

"I can provide you with one."

"Where, then?"

"At my lodging."

"Who?"

"My wife."

"Your wife! Are you married?"

"Why not? Do you think me too little?" retorted Gossec, who had recovered his gaiety and self-possession. In fact his diminutive figure, scarcely four and a half feet high, contrasted singularly with that of Rameau, whose leanness made him appear taller than he really was.

"I do not think you too small," said Rameau, "but I do think you very young."

"Is youth any obstacle to being in love? I was in love with my wife when I was only fifteen and she fourteen. I had nothing, no more had she; I had to give her something, so I gave her talent. She was my pupil before becoming my wife, and I can answer for her as for myself."

"Very well," replied the delighted Rameau, "go bring your wife immediately. If she is as clever as you say I will tell you a piece of good news. By the way," he added, stopping Gossec, who was preparing to go, "if I were to take you into a grand assembly, have you suitable garments for such an occasion?"

"Ma foi!" said Gossec, "these are my best, and if M. Rameau thinks them good enough, I should like to know who would be more particular than he?"

Gossec's best suit consisted of a coat of coarse maroon-colored cloth, a waistcoat of the same, breeches of black ratteen, stockings of clouded grey cotton, and shoes without buckles.

Rameau would not contradict him about the splendor of his costume; he let him depart, but he had scarcely disappeared when he called Mme. Rameau, who had just returned from mass.

"My dear," said he "put dinner forward an hour, lay two more covers, and send word immediately to the Opera that they must send me the costumer and the dress-maker without delay. I have the most urgent need of them."

Mme. Rameau obeyed without replying, and Rameau had scarcely had time to give these orders when Gossec returned with his wife.

The young husband and wife made the most charming little couple imaginable. Without being exactly pretty, Mme. Gossec was extremely attractive. To the freshness of her seventeen years she joined an air of candor and of artless intelligence which at once prepossessed in her favor. She was not so small as her husband, yet there was not between them that great disproportion always so displeasing when the advantage is not on the side of the man. Seeing them pass, every one might say, "What a pretty couple!" After looking at them a moment, an observer could not help exclaiming, "What a happy couple!"

Music in the Boston Public Schools

TWO PAPERS READ BY DR. J. BAXTER UPHAM AT THE CHURCH ASSOCIATION ROOMS, JAN. 20th & 27th.

I.

Ladies and Gentlemen—It is not without hesitation, and some serious misgivings of conscience, that I have accepted the invitation of your honored President to come before this association with the attempt to unfold the plan and purpose of musical instruction as it is now pursued in the public schools of Boston. To do this as it ought to be done—to do it fully, thoroughly and satisfactorily—would take up the time of many entire evenings and require the aid of copious illustrations, and the cooperation of the teachers and pupils in all the divisions and subdivisions of our comprehensive system of public-school instruction. And in the two consecutive evenings of this course, which your committee have kindly placed at my disposal, I shall not presume to more than sketch in outline the origin, progress and scope of such instruction, and exhibit, to a limited extent, the results which are now being accomplished.

As preliminary to my subject I will state, in fewest words, the organization of the Boston public-school system, with which all here present may not be familiar.

The whole scheme of public instruction is under the general care and supervision of the Board of School Committee, consisting of the mayor, the president of the Common Council, and ninety-six members—six from each ward. The schools are classified in three grand divisions or grades, called, respectively, the high, grammar and primary departments. There are, at present, five high schools, having an average of 1640 pupils; thirty-seven grammar schools, with 19,760 pupils, and three hundred and thirty-five primaries, with 14,716 pupils. Besides these there are several special schools, so-called, numbering eleven evening schools, two schools for licensed minors, one for deaf mutes, and one kindergarten school. Again, the primary schools are subdivided into six classes, each occupying one half of the year. The grammar schools are likewise graded into six classes, each class being intended to occupy the time of about one year. The courses in the high schools vary from three to six years. The arrangement in all the schools is such that each teacher has a separate room and each scholar a separate desk and chair.

The period of primary pupilage extends from the age of five to eight years; that of the grammar from eight to about fourteen or fifteen years; that of the high schools in age a year or two more. This army of about 38,000 children is placed under the care and instruction of a corps of 1001 teachers, of whom 147 are males and 854 are females. Of this number, 963 are employed in regular class instruction, and 38 in the teaching of special departments. The whole is under the surveillance of the superintendent of schools, as he is called,—the present incumbent of which office, Mr. Philbrick, has an almost world-wide reputation as an educationist of the highest order of ability.

I pass next to some historical data in the rise and progress of musical instruction in connection with these schools.

A little more than forty years ago Mr. William C. Woodbridge, the eminent geographer, delivered a lecture before the American Institute of Instruction in the hall of the House of Representatives, in Boston, advocating the expediency and practicability of introducing vocal music as a branch of common-school education. This convention numbered several hundred persons, mainly teachers, representing at least eleven states of the Union and comprising the highest educational ability of the land. Mr. Woodbridge had just returned from his educational tour in Europe and brought back with him the favorable opinions, on this subject, of the most distinguished educators in Germany and Switzerland; such men as Niemeyer, Schwartz, Denzel, Fellenberg, Pfeiffer, Nägeli and others. This effort of Mr. Woodbridge's produced a profound impression at the time. By it the first impulse was given to music as a branch of common education in our schools in America.

A year or two afterward Mr. George H. Snelling of this city, in behalf of a special committee appointed for that purpose, presented to the Primary School Board of Boston an elaborate report strongly urging the adoption of music as a regular study in our primary schools. This report of Mr. Snelling was in advance of the times. A partial experiment was made, but the plan was never fully carried out.

Soon afterward the 'Boston Academy of Music' was established, with our distinguished fellow citizen, the late Hon. Samuel A. Eliot, at its head. By them a memorial was presented to the School Committee, asking that vocal music be made a regular study in the schools of this city. This was in 1836. The next year the school board, by a select committee, offered a report in favor of the petition from the Academy, which was accepted and acted upon affirmatively by the board. But failing to obtain from the City Council the necessary appropriations, the measure was for the time defeated. Meanwhile one of the professors of the Academy, the late Dr. Lowell Mason, gave instruction, gratuitously, in one of the schools to test the experiment; and the next year the School Committee, well satisfied with the result, passed a vote to the effect that the Committee on Music be instructed to contract with a teacher of vocal music in the several public schools of the city. This vote of the School Committee of Boston (say the Academy of Music in their report of July, 1839) may be regarded as the Magna Charta of musical education in this country. From this time onward it has always existed as a recognized department of study in the schools, under many phases of organization, in greater or less degree of popular favor, and with varying success. But the time will not allow me to particularize.

In 1857 a decided step in advance was taken by the appointment on the part of the School board, of a Standing Committee on Music, and the adoption of a better and more uniform plan of instruction. Pianos were furnished to the grammar schools, and the instruction was extended to the Girls' High and Normal School, in order that the pupils of that institution might be qualified to become teachers of music in their turn. But even then the teaching was mainly confined to the two upper classes of the grammar schools—the lower grades as well as the primaries, although included in the letter of the regulations, receiving practically but little, if any attention.

It was not till July, 1864, that a special instructor in music was furnished for the primary schools; only in 1868 was the further step taken of providing a special instructor for the lower classes of the grammar schools; and not until the last year (that of 1872) was the chain of progressive instruction completed by the formal establishment of music as a recognized branch of study in all the high schools of the city.

By such slow and gradual steps has this branch of public instruction arrived at its present stage of existence. That it is yet imperfect in many respects, none are so conscious as those whose duty it has been in all these years to watch over and guide its hesitating and painful progress. But for the simplicity of its plan, for thoroughness of teaching, for good adaptation of means to the end, for abundant and legitimate results combined with a careful economy of administration, we venture to claim for it, even now, a place beside the best-tried schemes of public musical education.

The organization of this system of musical instruction is now as follows:

A corps of four professional teachers is employed by the city, who are called the Supervisors of musical instruction in the public schools. One of these, the chief Supervisor, as he is called, is at the same time the teacher of music in the high schools. His three associates are responsible respectively for the proper musical instruction of the upper and lower grades of the grammar classes and of the primary schools. There is, at present, also an assistant, so-called, for the newly annexed Dorchester district, who acts under the direction of the above-named officers. All are subject to the executive authority of the Standing Committee on Music, who derive their power from the general board.

The principal room in each of the high and grammar schools, as also in each of the properly graded primaries, is furnished with a piano, which is required to be kept in order and in tune. The rooms without pianos are supplied with a simple pitch-pipe, which can be made to give any sound of the middle octave. A set of charts, with stand or easel, forms also a part of the regular school furniture in each room, together with a manual for the teachers giving directions for the use of these charts.

In the plan of musical instruction two features stand out prominently—the simple but progressive and thorough scientific training imparted to the pupils, and the provision requiring the instruction to be given mainly by the regular school teachers under the general supervision and direction of the limited corps of professional gentlemen, as I have said. This last I hold to be essential and vital to the success of any plan of musical instruction connected with the public-school system as it exists in this country.

It might not be uninteresting just here, if I were to go over with you and explain this plan of instruction in detail, but I will trust that to the demonstration which is to follow. I will therefore occupy no more time with dry statistics and description, but will introduce you at once to Mr. Luther W. Mason, the supervisor of musical instruction in the primary department of the Boston Schools, and the class of pupils he has kindly brought here for the purpose of showing by actual demonstration the plan and method of teaching to which I have briefly referred.

It is hardly necessary for me to remind citizens of Boston what Mr. Mason has done for this branch of our public-school requirements. The scheme and method of instruction which he will show you to-night, with the helps devised for the pupils, the books and charts, manual and devices of various kinds, are all essentially his own. He has given his whole life to this work; and the best judges of the art, at home and abroad, have awarded to his labors their sympathy and their approval.

II.

Ladies and Gentlemen—In my paper of last week I gave some account of the origin, progress and scope of musical instruction in connection with the public schools of this city. I explained also, very briefly, the present organization of our school system in general, and the department of musical instruction in particular, and closed my imperfect sketch with a practical illustration, by a class of pupils, of the plan and methods of this instruction throughout the three years of primary study, under the personal direction of the supervisor of music in that department. Those who were present at that demonstration, saw that the first attempt of the teacher was to gain the attention of the children by singing to them some easy melodic phrase within the range adapted to their voices, and asking them to repeat it after him,—to imitate the sounds he had given them in their proper order. The interest of the children is thus excited, their attention aroused, their appreciation of musical sounds for the first time perhaps awakened. This preliminary rote singing,—for such it is, of the easiest and simplest kind,—is an appeal to the imitative faculty which young children possess in so great a degree of perfection; hence the greatest care should be taken that the example be a proper model for imitation as regards method and style, purity and correctness of tone, even in the utterance of the simplest musical phrase. These early rote lessons should therefore be given, when possible, by the professional teacher himself. Even at this early stage in the musical instruction, great attention is given to the formation of a proper quality of voice. The child is called upon to use a smooth and pleasant intonation in speaking, in reading, in recitation and in singing. Above all he is taught to avoid a noisy use of the voice. As preliminary to the exercise of the voice in singing, the young children are trained in the following essential points:

A proper position of the body.

The right management of the breath.

A good quality of utterance, as just mentioned.

The correct sound of the vowels.

A good articulation.

An intelligent expression of the sense.

Care, too, is to be taken in the singing exercises of young children, that a too great compass be not attempted. The child is allowed to sing only in the middle register, or where he makes the tones with the least effort. Commencing our instruction with the rote singing, as already stated, the first six sounds of the G scale only are attempted at the outset. Even within this limited range many of the best juvenile songs may be found. After the voice has been well practised in this compass, it may be extended upward and downward to a judicious extent, taking care not to strain the voice in the least degree.

The pitch and compass of the voice having thus been attended to, musical phrases of easy rhythmic structure are next taught in double and in triple time, the rote method still being used. At this stage musical notation in its simplest form is begun. The teacher explains, gives examples which the pupil is required to imitate. With all these, practical exercises upon the sounds of the scale are intermingled.

In the second year of primary instruction the pupil is taught to know the different kinds of notes and rests, to understand the nature of quadruple and sextuple time, and the manner of beating the same, the accentuation as applied to music, etc. He is also gently initiated into the mysteries of the chromatic scale, so far as the simple change from the natural into the keys of G and F major is concerned.

In the third and last year of primary instruction he is taught to describe by its intervals the major diatonic scale, etc., etc. And thus the three years' course of primary pupilage is closed.

We come now to the course of grammar school instruction, which, as I said last week, covers a period of about six years.

In the lowest class the pupil is rapidly led over the whole ground taken in his primary course, now and henceforward by reference to the musical characters—rote teaching and rote singing being for the most part abandoned. The child is here expected to begin to read the notation of simple musical phrases at sight.

In the sixth and lowest class is commenced an intellectual study of the sounds of the scale. Children are taught to recognize any sound of the scale by its scale name, and produce the same at the dictation of the teacher. This still further to educate the ear. This is followed by a representation of the sounds upon the musical scale, which trains the eye together with the ear.

A few minutes are thus spent, each day, as a drill exercise, followed by practice upon the music charts. This drill of single sounds is followed by triad practice, as it is called, and by the practice of two-part songs upon the charts, together with the beating of the time; and, in addition to this, in the next higher classes, by the chromatic scale and a study of the keys which grow out of it. It is safe to say that at the end of the second or third year the class will have a sufficient knowledge of the nine different keys to enable them to sing correctly any chorale which may be written in any of those keys, at sight. This brings us through the two lower classes and completes the second series of charts, which covers the major scales in nine keys.

In the third year of the grammar course is commenced the study of such intervals as are necessary to a thorough understanding and analysis of the triads on the different degrees of the scale, such as the major and minor second, major and minor third, perfect and diminished fifth, etc.; also the most usual form of the chord of the seventh is taught, as will presently be shown. After the class is familiar with the major and minor thirds, there follows an explanation of the Roman numerals used to indicate major and minor on different degrees of the scale, etc., etc. But I will not take up further time with these details. All this will better appear in the illustrations which are to follow. Suffice it to say that the pupils are gradually becoming familiar with the groundwork of three-part singing as based upon the triads, and in acquiring a practical knowledge of the inversion of the triads.

At the end of the fourth year the pupils can readily sing in plain three-part harmonies, and should understand all the signs and characters used in musical composition, and be able to comprehend and read at sight any of the music found in our ordinary collections of psalmody. This is as far as it is proposed to carry the subject this evening.

An essential element in the plan of such teaching, up to this point, as we have seen, is this, that it be given mainly by the regular school teachers, with the aid and general direction only of a professional teacher. I wish to emphasize this point, for it is an essential and vital feature in our plan of public musical instruction.

And we take it for granted that all the regular teachers can do their part in such instruction. It requires, in the system we have been considering, no special musical ability, or previous training, for the acceptable performance of this work. An aptness to teach only is necessary, and any person who is fitted in other respects to hold the responsible position of teacher in a public school has the ability, we contend, to learn in a very short time (under the direction of a competent professional head,) how to teach the elements of music, as well as the other studies required in our common schools. Nor is it necessary that the teacher should be able to sing in order to be successful in this branch of study, though of course it is an aid.

A few words as to the time which is given to such instruction in the curriculum of school work. Ten minutes in each session in the primary schools, and fifteen minutes each day in the lower classes of the grammar schools are devoted to instruction in music by the regular teachers of the schools. The upper classes of the grammar department devote one half-hour each week to this study, under the personal instruction of the professional teacher, and, in addition, ten minutes each day are given to musical instruction by the regular teachers of these classes, under the general direction of the music teacher. In the high schools a specified number of hours each week is devoted to this study, under the personal tuition of the professional teacher, and in the normal school such instruction is required to be given as shall qualify the pupils to teach in their turn this branch of study in our common schools.

A systematic and progressive course of musical instruction is thus given to all the pupils of the public schools in the city of Boston, commencing with the children of five or six years of age, when they first enter the primary school-room, and ending with the advanced classes of the high schools—young men and young women who are just entering upon the duties and responsibilities of real life. It is not the question of these sketches to argue the question of the importance of this specialty as a branch of common-school education. I take it for granted that the benefit of such instruction, if properly carried out, is now generally appreciated. Its efficiency as a means of recreation and of discipline in the school-room, its agency in the formation of a refined and melodious speech, its humanizing influence upon both teacher and pupil, is recognized and acknowledged by the best educators in our own and in other lands.

It has sometimes been urged, in opposition to this study, that too much time is taken up, or is liable to be taken up, in preparation for the festivals and other public musical demonstrations which naturally grow out of it. Perhaps in former years, in the infancy of its adoption, this might have been; but it is so no longer. I have already alluded to the limited time which is daily allotted to it in the schools; and as to the time now given to preparation and rehearsal for public musical exhibitions, I need only say that at the first National Peace Festival (so-called), which took place in the old Coliseum in the summer of 1869, when the schools were made participants in the programme, and about six thousand pupils took part in the last day's performance, the occupation (once or twice a week) of the usual hour for the music lesson, for two or three ted to the prescribed schedule. Time only for a single rehearsal in the Coliseum was allowed. This occurred on the day preceding the public performance, and was conducted as best it could be, amid the clatter of hammers and saws, and the multitudinous interruption of a great army of listeners. Those who were present on the day of the concert will not soon forget the profound and inspiring effect produced upon the vast assemblage. More recently, also, at the entertainment given by the pupils of the Boston schools in honor of the Grand Duke Alexis (about a year ago), still less opportunity was allowed for preparation. The concert was given, it may be remembered, on Saturday afternoon. On the Monday previous the music began to be distributed to the schools by sections, the city being divided for this purpose into four divisions,—one section or division being supplied each day. The first four days of the week were thus required to complete the circuit. A single lesson of one or two hours in duration was allowed to each school. On Friday there was a partial rehearsal in Bumstead Hall, followed by a full rehearsal, with orchestra and organ, upon the stage in the Music Hall, which together occupied about one hour and a half. And the next day the public performance was given in presence of the imperial visitor and an audience which crowded the building to its utmost capacity.

I have thus, in the two evenings which your committee has kindly appropriated to this subject, glanced hastily at the record of this movement in connection with our Boston public schools, and at some points in the plan of instruction as at present existing. We cannot now predict what the ultimate results of this system of universal instruction upon a community like ours may be. The full effect of the unbroken progressive plan has not yet been reached. It requires, as we have seen, a period of about twelve years to complete the course. I have attempted to cover, in these demonstrations, only about three-quarters of this course. If we had time to follow it up into the higher grades of the schools we should find it there developing in its æsthetic and mathematical relations—in its bearing upon the theory of counterpoint and musical composition. But I do not propose now to trench upon this advanced ground,—not only for want of time, but also because the period I have taken is the compass within which the large majority of the children attending our public schools may be found, and is, to my mind the most important portion of the school age for public musical education.

I have now the pleasure of introducing to the association Mr. H. E. Holt, the accomplished supervisor of musical instruction in the lower classes of the grammar schools in Boston. Mr. Holt will exhibit to you the plan of instruction as carried on in the first four years of grammar-school pupilage, which comes especially under his charge.

Refinement.

Refinement is not fastidiousness. It is not luxury. It is nothing of this kind. It is far removed from excess or waste. A person truly refined will not squander or needlessly consume anything. Refinement, on the contrary, is always closely allied to simplicity and a judicious and tasteful employment of the means of good and happiness which it has at command. It seeks to divest itself of superfluities and aspires continually to the utmost possible purity.

To commence at a material base, refinement leads to personal cleanliness and elegant neatness, good taste and simplicity in dress. All "loudness" or "flashiness" is repugnant to its spirit. In its home and surroundings, whether palatial, affluent or humble, the same chasteness and unaffected grace are maintained. The abode of genuine refinement, and of the mere pretender to it, are very different. In the former you will find no excess, gaudiness or false glitter, but the latter abounds with it.

In personal manner, refinement is most conspicuous. A man of refinement is always polite without flourish, gentle without effeminacy, and considerate without stiffness. Display and ceremony are not identical with refinement and are poor substitutes for it. There is, of course, no refinement like that of the heart, which impels its possessor to show on all occasions a thoughtful and kindly regard for the feelings of others. No adherence to etiquette can compare with it for insuring the spontaneous observance of true and gratifying politeness.

In art, refinement is a most essential element. It is the greatest enhancement of beauty. It is a most attractive excellence in every style of composition, prose or poetical, and without it painting and sculpture lose the most exalting attribute of their beauty. In music, refinement marks the highest order of writing. Sublimity is impossible without it. In the greatest works it is carried to remarkable perfection, excluding the slightest taint of vulgarity, commonplace or redundancy, and retaining only the ripe fruit of genuine inspiration in its pure expression and significance.

It is impossible that a composition which has no heart or substance should be refined, because it is meaningless, and there is nothing to refine. Anything laden with superfluities must be freed from them to become refined; but if such compositions were subjected to this process nothing would be left of them when it was completed. It is a pity that it cannot be freely applied, but it would only a little anticipate the work of time.

There is music considered refined because it is the product of the modern school, enjoying the advantages of the teachings of the past, and mechanical improvements of the present, which is hardly worthy of the esteem in which it is implicitly held by many. It is less significant than difficult, less profound than curious, and instead of depending for its effect upon the intrinsic beauty of its harmonies, produces them by a striking method of instrumentation. This is a school that has been coming more and more into vogue, but which must in the end die out from the exhaustion of its resources. When it is no longer a novelty it will cease to be interesting. It is too superficial, and unless it grow richer in deep feeling it cannot last. That it can rightly claim a certain material refinement cannot be denied; but unless it also attain to the refinement of the spirit it will pass away to "Years beyond the flood."

The Voice, and how to Use it.

BY W. H. DANIELL.

[From the Worcester Palladium.]

I.

METHOD.

What is the meaning of this much-abused term as applied to vocal use? Why should those who sing already in a manner pleasing to themselves and their indulgent friends, be told that they need method—why not sing without method? Why cannot one become an artist by simply imitating the best models, without going through the very tedious process of acquiring that terrible something called method? Besides, what and whose method is to be adopted, in order to gain the desired end? We hear of the Italian, German, Garcia, Bassini, Streeter, and various other methods. Which is correct, and how are we to know whom to believe? It is to answer these and other questions that naturally suggest themselves to the earnest mind, that I commence this series of articles, hoping to clear some doubts that exist, and give some definite ideas as to what are the proper principles for the use of the voice, according to my teaching.

And first, let me ask why it is not as well for a mechanic to work by imitation? Cannot one by watching a carpenter at his work, become equally skilful? Cannot an amateur painter attain an equal ability with Church, Kensett and Hill, by simply seeing them at their wonderful work? Cannot the would-be pianist become equally great with Rubinstein by watching his fingers? Cannot the unskilled violin player, self-taught, equal the world's great ones, by simply seeing them play? Of course the answer must invariably be in the negative—and is the voice so far beneath all of these as to be subject to different laws? Why, the voice is the noblest of all instruments, and subject to invariable laws. It is the proper application of these laws which we call method. Let us not attach any one name to the term, but deal simply with method in its fullest sense. You, my friend, have a good voice, perhaps, and think that by imitation of the best singers you hear, you can do all for yourself. But who are the best? Not those who please you best, for your lack of experience may have deprived you of opportunity to hear a variety of artists, and you may model on a local singer, whose total absence of a well-defined method would render him an undesirable model. But even supposing that you may have opportunities for hearing different singers of acknowledged rank, whom will you imitate?

In Worcester you have heard among others, Mrs. Chas. Moulton, Mrs. Julia Houston-West, and Mrs. H. M. Smith, for sopranos—Miss Phillips, Miss Alice Fairman, Miss Sterling and Miss Ryan for contraltos—Fessenden, Simpson, and Osgood for tenors—Guilmette, Rudolphsen, and Sprague for basses. All of these are before the public as artists. Public performers are educators. Now these ladies and gentlemen all differ widely in method. In other words, they deliver their tones according to different principles.—You ladies who sing soprano, have the choice here of three examples—which will you take?—Contraltos, I offer you four notable ladies who differ widely. Which is the choice. Tenors, I could not give three who differed more, yet all are favorites. Basses can find entirely different principles at work in the singing of the gentlemen named. Are all correct?

I have nothing to remark regarding any of these. My work is not to criticize individuals, but to set forth such principles as shall lead you to decide for yourselves. Let us then assume that some fixed principles are necessary in singing or speaking, and at once the question comes up as to how one is to know where truth is to be found. One says that the voice has registers, another that it has none. One talks about the larynx, pharynx, glottis, trachea, &c., while another talks simply of the vocal chords. One talks of chest, medium and head tones, while another throws aside the whole. Now I propose to talk as plainly as possible and make my meaning understood by those who know nothing at all of the science of vocalization. If what I have to offer does not commend itself to the common sense of my readers, I had better not have taken pen in hand.

II.

Pupil. Mr. Daniell, before you proceed farther, will you explain one little remark made in your last—"Public performers are educators."

Mr. D. Certainly, but is it not a self-evident fact? The mass of listeners are not critical, but are willing to assume that any singer whose name has appeared in the public prints a number of times, must be all that is proper. They will therefore yield their own opinions and induce themselves to believe that to be right which their good, natural sense of hearing tells them is wrong. It is the easiest thing possible to give up your opinions, when you stand in the small minority. Now, what you believe to be right, you will naturally copy after, or the mass will. The managers who put forward new people are well aware of this, and handle the public accordingly. If the papers can be induced to write up a singer, the general public believe all to be genuine, and thus their own real opinions are unconsciously shaped by men who have only personal interests in the matter. American audiences have yet to learn to be really critical, that they may avoid having singers imposed on them who do not properly understand their art.

Pupil. You are severe; and are you not a little one-sided? You assume all to be bad, and the public to be always imposed upon; yet that is certainly not so.

Mr. D. True, it is by no means always so, but the true artist is frequently left out of sight by an audience who do not appreciate purity of style and method, but demand what is commonly termed clap-trap, or sensational singing, rather than pure, artistic rendering. But all this we shall come to as we go on. Suffice it to say that we have had singers who were models, as for instance, Sontag, Alboni, LaGrange, Salvi, Badiali, Amodio, Bellini. You will notice that I instance those who have passed off the stage. You must learn to select for yourself among those still before the public.

Pupil. You have defined method as "a proper application of law." Do not all singers before the public make use of certain laws in using their voices?

Mr. D. Not all. I do believe, judging from the results, that some singers have no laws known to themselves, for the government of their tones. I remember at one time when a rivalry existed between two Italian primo tenori, belonging to rival troupes in California, one said of the other: "Whatever my shortcomings may be, I have at least a school, which Signor B— has not and never will have." By school he meant method as we have it. He was right. Signor B— had no school, and thought he did not need one; but when listening to his continual flattening one wished that the Signor had some law for his proper direction.

Pupil. You speak as if there might be a variety of schools or methods, and all right. Is it so?

Mr. D. Let us remember that the whole of truth never yet lay in any one direction. People may arrive at similar conclusions by different roads.

You know that according to Charles Lamb's theory, the Chinese, having discovered the excellence of roast pig by means of the conflagration of a house, adopted that method of obtaining their roast pig for long after, in the same manner; whereby the roast pig was not quite so good as if cooked in a smaller fire, while the builders' trade was improved. I often think that the Voice Building need becomes the greater, on account of similar causes.

Pupil. A little obscure. Do you then think some methods so injurious? The whole of truth is not apt to lie in one direction, as you say, but I have been led to think the Italian method pure and safe.

Mr. D. Ah! the Italian method! Whose Italian method? At the beginning of the 18th century the genuine old Italian method was taught by Porpora and others, and such singers as then appeared, were, if history can be credited, something marvellous. Delicacy and beauty of singing were striven after, rather than the shouting, now considered essential. The old Italian method was undoubtedly very pure, but if men were to sing in that delicate manner now, they would be voted tame.

Pupil. But is there no way of gaining those same results now?

Mr. D. I believe firmly that there is, and in this way. Let us become aware of one very important fact to begin with. Singing and speaking are (or should be) identical.

Pupil. My dear sir, how can that be? when I speak, I use only a moderate amount of breath; but when I sing, I use much more and have to exert myself as well.

Mr. D. That is precisely the point. You do use more breath, but should not. You do exert yourself, but need not. For instance, take any simple word, father, for instance—first speak it in a natural tone of voice, and then in monotone in the same manner. Do you not see that the monotone is singing? Now rise a tone and deliver it in the same manner, and so on until you have gone up five notes and then return.

Pupil. That is all easy enough to be sure, but the amount of tone is not worth speaking of, and besides, it became harder as I ascended.

Mr. D. One thing at a time. The tone, you say, was not loud. Ah! that is the old trouble. "Power! give us power! We do not yet know how to creep, but we must be prepared to run a race immediately." No, my friend, you do not make much power, but you will find that before a great while power will come into your voice to your entire satisfaction. You have not properly understood what constituted power, but have wrongly believed that in order to sing a loud note one must shout, or to play ff on the piano, one must bang the instrument. It is not so. Easy, flexible action is what we need. Now reading is useful, substituting a line of poetry for the single word as you have used it. Take one line on C, the next on D, and so on. Make no effort, but let the words flow out of your mouth with the breath. The sound may be light, but it will not tire you at least, and that is worth something.

III.

Pupil. It seems to me that the term register is one which is not clearly understood—at least I have never been able to gain any definite idea of its meaning from the different explanations that I have received. Why is it?

Mr. D. It has not been properly simplified.—Let me endeavor to convey the true idea. Many explanations have been given by writers and teachers, and yet the true meaning is generally left in rather a haze. Every lady finds in her voice, when commencing at the middle C, (or the lowest C usually sung by her,) and singing up the scale, that on arriving at the first F, or thereabouts, a desire for change in character of tone will show itself;—allowing the change to occur, all goes smoothly, until arriving at about D, when another change asserts itself;—allowing this second change to take place, the voice assumes a thinner character, which extends as far as the voice is capable of going. This is merely fact and to be found in all female voices. No reasoning can throw this plain fact out of sight. We have then to reason on the cause. Now as I have said before, all tone is produced in the vocal chord, to use simply that term. Expansion gives low and contraction high tones. Ascending the scale, contraction takes place to the utmost that the chord will naturally bear, when another position is taken. Please lift a weight from the floor, keep your arms straight, and the strain comes on your knees and shoulders. Lift as high as you can with the shoulders—you suddenly come to a stop, and yet the weight is not far from the ground. In order to raise it higher a new position must be taken. The strain must then come upon your wrists, until you can raise the weight sufficiently to reverse them, when you push up, the strain coming on your fore-arm and shoulder. The simile is perhaps rude, but it may strike you that the first movement is not altogether a bad representation of the lower register, while the pushing up indicates the upper, the turning of the wrist representing the difficulty to be overcome in passing from one to the other. Again, the flute has a limited number of keys and finger-holes, yet the player contrives to get over a great range, using the same keys and finger-holes for wide extremes of tone. How is this?

Pupil. Why, by changing the embouchure, of course. When the limit of a scale is reached, the lips must be more compressed, and so a higher tone reached.

Mr. D. Very well; then a new position is taken. So also with the Cornet, and every other wind instrument—all are governed by the same laws. Now is there anything remarkable in the voice requiring the application of similar law? But it may be said that, while these instruments produce a uniformity of tone throughout, the voice varies greatly when passing from one register to another.

Pupil. Precisely what I was about to say. I listened not long since to a singer, highly endorsed, in whose voice there appeared a very decided change, when passing from the high notes to the low. The upper tones were pleasant to listen to, but the low notes must have been of the order to which you referred, as being mannish.

Mr. D. Did they please you?

Pupil. No, I did not like them at all, but as the audience seemed generally to find satisfaction in them, I concluded that the fault must be in myself.

Mr. D. Your convictions were correct. They were wrong and bad altogether. Now what would be thought of a teacher of the flute, who should train his pupils to play in this manner? He would not be tolerated. Why should the voice be treated worse than the keyed instruments? A very common way of training the voice is to establish a fixed boundary, up to which point a certain kind of tone shall be produced, and then, changing the boundary line, establish another kind of tone, differing altogether from the first; in fact, establishing compartments, having no affinity for each other. I believe this to be wrong. As I have said before, the so-called chest tones, having the unearthly sound of which you speak, are set back in the mouth while the upper tones must come forward. The crowded, mannish tones please the singer, as being very full, rich, vibratory, telling, and the like, but they are really neither one of these. Put your head into an empty hogshead and speak. You will hear much noise without doubt, but I will venture the assertion that very little sound is heard a few steps off—so it is with this unnatural chest tone. It will not be heard at any great distance, while pure, free tone will be heard at quite a distance, as clearly as near at hand. No, freedom of tone we must have, and power will come as a result.

Pupil. But is not this hard low tone more natural in the production, than the free tone of which you speak?

Mr. D. It seems so in some, but only because they forget, or do not know, that speaking and singing are governed by the same laws. A great many people think it a grand thing to talk with a deep tone, which is all proper if nature so establishes, but I do not believe in cultivating the habit of talking in a lower key than is perfectly natural. The tone will inevitably become set and stiff.

Pupil. How then will you manage with one who talks in a stiff manner? Speaking and singing are the same, you say; will not the singing be stiff, in spite of all endeavors to the contrary?

Mr. D. The pupil must read rapidly, in different parts of the voice, so that no opportunity is afforded to set the tone. I can assure you that nature will assert her rights, if you give her but a fair chance; of course, the teacher cannot do all. If the pupil desires to improve, no obstacle must be interposed, but entire yielding must take place. I have had pupils who desired to gain the good, without being willing to give up the bad. No efforts of mine could then avail. In studying the voice, make up your mind that your teacher understands his art, and then yield yourself to him. Do not go half-way. Be in earnest. "What is worth doing at all, is worth doing well."

BOSTON, FEB. 22, 1878.

Oratorios.

"Elijah" and "Judas Maccabæus" were performed on the evenings of Saturday and Sunday, Feb. 8th and 9th. The former, of course, drew the fullest house; for it is well known, dramatic, brilliant, with full modern instrumentation, sensational (though not in a bad sense), and always popular. Moreover, if the Handel and Haydn Society are "well up" in any oratorio, they are so in Elijah. This is the work they choose, when they would make their best impression upon strangers; and so tempting is it to appear thus in all their glory, that other and even greater works year after year still go unlearned:—so much sweeter than study is the fruit of study, the triumphant exhibition: so much more stimulating to exertion is the hope of an excursion to another city to astonish Gotham, than a quiet, inwardly rewarding and improving winter's campaign into the heart of that hardly half explored, certainly unconquered, and exhaustless territory of Bach's Passion Music. But such is human nature!—Another reason why Elijah had a larger audience than Judas is, that Sunday evening is no longer, as it used to be, the time regarded as the most convenient and proper for attendance on an Oratorio; with some, we dare say, it is a matter of religious scruples, with others only a question of railroads. Only the Messiah is deemed quite sacred enough to overcome the hesitancy of the former class.

The performance of Elijah this time was of about the usual excellence; very impressive to the many, but without much to give it a fresh life and interest to those who know it all by heart. Of course the great dramatic energy and fervor, combined with the thorough artistic intelligence, of Mme. RUDERSDORFF went far to place the Soprano recitatives and arias in a strong light, albeit frequently a somewhat harsh one, owing to the struggles of a voice no longer in its prime, and only now and then renewing its beautiful youth in a way that all could hail it with delight. Yet is the presence of the great artist always unmistakable. "Hear ye, Israel" was given with rare power. Her least successful effort, naturally, was in the quartet: "Holy, holy!"—Miss ALICE FAIRMAN, in her quiet, unimpassioned way, but with her very rich, pure, sweet and even voice, and thoroughly sound and honest style of singing, won sincere applause by her delivery of the Contralto melodies. And she took "O rest in the Lord" in a less slow and dragging time than we have been too much accustomed to. The Tenor solos found adequate expression in the fine voice, the pure intonation, the earnest fire and true intelligence of Mr. NELSON VARLEY. The only drawbacks in his singing are a certain dry and slightly nasal quality in some of his tones, and in high climbing passages an apparent effort as of one screwing himself up to "the height of his great enterprise,"—yet with all the exactness and the certainty of such a lever. It seemed as if he struggled with the remnant of a cold. Mr. M. W. WHITNEY presented the central figure of the Prophet with his usual majesty and massiveness of style, although he was by no means in his best voice, his voluminous tones sounding somewhat hollow; and he relapsed too often into his old fault of lifelessness. It would be unjust, however, to say this of "Is not His word like a fire, and like a hammer that breaketh," which he declaimed with an all-sufficient and unflagging vigor, making every note tell. "The mountains shall depart" was grandly sung too, and a new oboe in the leading phrase made itself felt to good advantage. The orchestra seemed well up to its work. The chorus was a little weaker in the bass than usual, but otherwise its tasks were creditably, sometimes splendidly achieved. There was an awkward hitch in the Double Quartet, which did not settle into unity of outline for some time. But the single Quartets, and the Angel Trio, in which Miss CARRIE BRACKETT took the middle part, between Mme. RUDERSDORFF and Miss FAIRMAN, went evenly and smoothly.

Judas Maccabæus, old as it is, and in spite of the sketchy, incomplete accompaniment of Handel's score, compared with the brilliant modern instrumentation of Elijah, has the fresher charm of the two to those who care most for intrinsic musical beauty and pure, sustained high tone of character. Of late years it has been too seldom given here; perhaps never really well given before that memorable performance last year when Miss Edith Wynne, Cummings and Santley took part in it. Then, too, the audience was select and small,—smaller even than it was this last time. One reason for this is, that most people imagine themselves much more familiar with the music than they are, merely because "The conquering hero" chorus, and one or two other numbers have been often heard. Another reason is, that the work as a whole has always been so mutilated, or so indifferently rendered, particularly in the solo pieces, that a vague impression of its general dulness has prevailed, and most unjustly. But we cannot help believing that there is still another cause, less generally known and understood by the listener, but interfering with his pleasure none the less, for the indifference with which this, one of the most inspired, original and beautiful of Handel's oratorios, has been regarded by so many. Let us explain.

It is well known that in the printed scores of Handel's Oratorios, Cantatas, &c., the orchestral accompaniment is for the most part a mere sketch. Handel himself was accustomed to preside at the organ in the performance, and could fill out the harmony, the intertwining polyphony according to his own idea. But in the written and afterwards engraved scores, with only here and there an exception, we find the voice part, with perhaps a principal violin, or oboe in unison with it, and nothing but a figured basso continuo besides; nothing to fill the wide, hollow chasm between the upper melody and the monotonous deep rumbling or roaring basses. In the fugued, or contrapuntal choruses, of course, the harmonic texture has to be complete. But with the Arias it is very different; these were left for Handel's personal accompaniment, or for after-elaboration by some skilful, sympathetic hand; for such completion of the sketch as Mozart has made for the Messiah (and yet not all of it), and Robert Franz for the "L'Allegro ed il Penseroso," as well as for much of Bach's Passion Music. Now, blindly following tradition, it has been the custom here, as in England, to perform the Judas with that mere empty, colorless, monotonous and tedious accompaniment, which is all that the published score furnishes for many of the most important Arias. On this account too, doubtless, many of these Arias and Duets are left out oftener than they would be, were they enriched and illustrated by a complete setting. Of course most hearers are unconscious why they are so dull.

A striking instance of the difference in the two treatments was shown on Sunday evening in two of the finest of the Soprano airs. The one in which Mme. RUDERSDORFF made her best success of the evening, and which she sang so exquisitely: "Wise men flattering," happened for once to have received the especial attention of the composer, who left it armed with full accompaniment, and everybody knows how rich, complete and beautiful was the effect. On the contrary that other exquisite Air near the beginning: "O Liberty," was sung to absolutely nothing but the violoncello obligato; can any one for a moment imagine that Handel so intended it? So too, in part or wholly, with those heroic tenor and bass arias; splendid vocalization, a ringing, fervent, clear delivery, arouse the audience; but how much more magnificent would their effect be, were the harmony completed and the instrumentation filled out as it is only at the return of the first theme in "Sound an alarm"!

Besides this pervading infirmity, which we hope will one day be remedied (for certainly there lives the man to do it, and in a way after Handel's own heart), this oratorio suffered on this, as on all previous occasions, by too liberal curtailment. One of the very finest of the choruses: "For Zion lamentation make," was left out entirely; and that most rich and swelling and sublime of all the choruses: "Tune your harps" was badly cut. How persuasively it enters, on the dominant chord with seventh, taking up the burthen of the soprano solo! How clear and full the flow of all the parts! And how wonderfully beautiful is that passage near the close, where the basses climb from the low B to the high E, and hold it out through half a dozen measures, while the tenors from high G traverse a like distance downwards, and the sopranos steadily sear to the high A!

All the choruses are beautiful and grand; some filled with heroic patriotic ardor, inspiring martial courage; others breathing the most pure and deep religious feeling. In no oratorio is the pervading tone more high, religious, sacrificial. And they are picturesque, suggesting real scenes; you see those tribes of worshippers before you. The choruses were in the main very effectively sung. We only take exception to a point of rendering, namely to such exaggerated contrasts of fortissimo and pianissimo as were made in the repeats of "See, the conquering hero comes."

The solos were for the most part sung with good expression and effect. Mme. RUDERSDORFF, by the vitality and fervor, the dramatic verve, with which she rendered her strong parts, as well as by the subtle delicacy and charm of her reading in such strains as we have before alluded to,—by her complete at-home-ness in the music, and her legitimate grand artist style of song and recitation (only marred by indulgence in some of those worn out conventionalisms of the idols of the theatre and concert room;—excessive lengths of trill, loud high notes upon a final cadence to hang applause on, &c., &c.),—largely redeemed all the short-comings of a voice considerably worn by long and glorious service, and obliged sometimes to force its way, to take forzando what might otherwise elude its grasp. Yet there are passages in which the voice is still very beautiful. She is best in grand declamation, or in large, sustained cantabile, or in the delicate finesses of sotto voce. In rapid roulades, evenly and surely as she executes them, the tones have a loud breathing, muffled quality, betraying more of will than voice.—Miss FAIRMAN's voice was of just the right character for the calm, serious, religious air: "Father of Heaven," beginning Part III., in which, as in the Duets, she made an excellent impression.—Miss CARRIE BRACKETT, a pupil of Mrs. Harwood, made her first appearance in these oratorios. She has a pure, sweet, flexible, and rather thin soprano voice, and showed good style and execution in the florid air: "So shall the lute and harp awake." Her part, too, in the opening Duet and the Trio of Elijah was quite creditable.

But the chief honors of the oratorio were borne away by the tenor hero, Judas. Mr. VARLEY seemed to do his best, fairly electrifying the audience by his splendid trumpet tones in "Sound an alarm," which never made so strong a mark here before. A repetition was imperatively claimed and granted. The singer showed himself master of the Handelian roudades in other arias, and was most successful in the rendering of the very difficult "How vain is man." Mr. WHITNEY sang superbly "The Lord worketh wonders," and generally was more himself than on the preceding night.

Harvard Symphony Concert.

The programme for the sixth Concert, Feb. 6, after repeated alterations and remodellings, finally came out in this shape.

*Overture to "Preciosa".....Weber.
Pianoforte Concerto, No. 2, in B flat, Op. 19. Beethoven.

Allegro con brio.—Adagio.—Allegro molto.
(Cadenza by Moscheles.)

B. J. Lang.
Overture: "The Fair Melusina".....Mendelssohn.

Concertstueck, in G, for Piano and Orchestra,
Op. 92.....Schumann.
Introduction and Allegro appassionato.

B. J. Lang.
"Ocean" Symphony in C, Op. 52.....A. Rubinstein.
Allegro maestoso.—Adagio.—Allegro.—
Adagio and Allegro con fuoco.

It suited the clamorers for novelty better than it satisfied the musical conscience of all who had a hand in shaping it; and it must be acknowledged, the expressions of pleasure in the concert, especially the second part, have been numerous and spontaneous to a degree not very confidently expected. Of course the great feature was the "Ocean" Symphony by Rubinstein. The Thomas orchestra had given us the two "additional" movements which Rubinstein wrote to it as an after-thought; and in one of Mr. Lang's chamber concerts last year, the first, as being the best, movement of the original Symphony was outlined in a four-hand piano arrangement; otherwise the Symphony as such was to be heard now for the first time in Boston. The first plan contemplated giving only the first movement, balanced or contrasted with Haydn's short "Surprise" Symphony in the first Part. But it was thought, after all, more wise and just to offer the whole Symphony or none of it, and let the work speak for itself, for how can the single movement be seen in the right light except in its relation with the others?

And what was the result? That, in spite of its great length, and of its place in the last quarter of the two hours, it did absorb the general attention to the end, and was the topic of enthusiastic comment among many in the throng going out, is a fact not to be ignored. Whether the admiration was well founded, whether the charm will last, is at the same time a fair question. Opinions and impressions were by no means unanimous. Most will probably agree that they liked the first movement best; some were more captivated by the Adagio, or the quasi Scherzo, or the rousing Finale; some were made happy by all parts alike; and some (among them musicians of the best qualified to judge) pronounced it all a vague, vain striving after grandeur and originality, cheating the sense with instrumental splendors and effects, but not speaking to the soul with that clear, divine authority with which all the great music, through all the individualities of genius, has always spoken. Who ever had a doubt, even on the first hearing, about the musical validity and charm and heavenly quality of anything by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann? And who is not puzzled all the time, in hearing these new Symphonists, to know whether it is really music in the best sense,—in that sense, namely, which has made music so divine a part of life to him? Here is ambition, of a titanic sort sometimes, and talent, wide grasp of resources, study, enterprise, great laying out of plans; we cannot, or we would not say it is all naught; but why does it leave us on the outside of itself, admiring, it may be, but unconvinced, unedified, shut out from that serene, sweet, holy atmosphere of harmony, which we have lived in times enough and long enough to know that he who does not bring us that brings not the real boon of music.

For ourselves we will not commit ourselves to an opinion until we know the work much better. We can simply say, that as a tone-poem of the "Ocean," whether in the descriptive or suggestive sense, the four long movements of this Symphony fail to reproduce to us a tithe of that essential poetry of the Ocean which we recognize in Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille" Overture. Striving after much more, it seems to us much less imaginative. Perhaps it was too vast, impracticable a theme for music. The first movement, to be sure, has something vast, gigantic, full of sense of isolation and of distance, full of storm and calm, of sunbeam and of chilling shadow, of sickening monotony of unrest;—unrest without the musical sense of progress, but rather the wide weltering sameness of the real waste of waters. The two principal themes are interesting; the one exhilarating and adventurous, entering in sunshiny flute tones, the other of a pleasing sentimental mood; and they are worked through with skill, with breadth and fullness of instrumentation, rich contrasts of color, but with too frequent recurrence, as if from sense of duty to the subject, of the rumbling monotony and swing of the deep basses, relieved again by cheerful glimpses of a bright blue sky.

The Adagio seemed tame to us, and lacking any individual style or impress to distinguish it from Mendelssohn or Gade, save that it was less interesting. The Scherzo ("Allegro"), rollicking and fierce, like sailors' revelry, disturbed by traits of positive coarseness and uncouthness; nor did we bring away a much more favorable impression of the Finale, with all its vigorous élan.—But these are first impressions; perhaps the whole thing will mean more to us some day. One word, however, with regard to style. We have looked in vain for anything which we could call distinctively a Rubinstein style; anything which, being unlike that of others whose music always charms, yet fascinates by an individuality of its own and by an equally divine right. Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Rossini, they are all unlike by virtue each of his peculiar genius; is there any such distinctive flavor or aroma in this music to enable you to say that only this man's genius could produce the like of it?—The performance of a work so difficult, with short rehearsal, was highly creditable to Mr. ZERRAHL and his orchestra.

The other novelty of the programme, Schumann's Concertstueck, a work of about half the length of a regular Concerto, proved extremely interesting, full of thought and beauty, and characteristic of its author. The instrumentation is refined and rich. Mr. LANG was fully master of its great difficulties and gave, with good co-operation of the orchestra, a very clear and satisfactory interpretation. The B-flat Concerto of Beethoven is not one of his great ones; it is in the master's earlier and simpler style, but fresh, melodious and full of grace. Mr. Lang had played it once before in the second season of these concerts, and also last year in concerts of his own; and it bears repetition. His rendering was perfectly clean, refined and delicate, showing masterly execution in the Moscheles cadenza. But here again comes up the old question with regard to such cadenzas; does not so simple and unpretending a movement as that first Allegro appear overloaded by a long, elaborate and difficult cadenza of that sort; especially when, as in this case, your expectation of the return of the orchestra is cheated by three or four closing chords and nothing more? The added ornament seems out of all proportion to the modest original; too much like those marvellous structures which our modern ladies pile upon their heads. The Finale is the most original and piquant part of this Concerto.—The two Overtures were very much enjoyed; Weber's fresh, bright little gipsy prelude giving a lively zest at the beginning of the feast.

The seventh concert, next Thursday Afternoon, Feb. 27, offers a particularly interesting programme, namely: Overture: "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Piano, with Orch.: "Serenade and Allegro gioioso," Mendelssohn, (Hugo Leonhard); Aria: "Son confusa pastorella," Handel, with orchestration by R. Franz (Mrs. G. A. Barry).—Overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro," Mozart; Krakowiak*, for Piano, with Orchestra, Chopin, (H. Leonhard); Songs, Mrs. Barry; Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Schumann.—Mrs. Barry's Songs in the second part are: a. Ave Maria, by Franz (with string orchestra); b. The Soldier's Bride*, Schumann; c. Goethe's "May Song," Franz.

Chamber Concerts.

Messrs. LEONHARD and EICHBERG had another full hall for their second matinée, Feb. 14, which gave equal satisfaction with the first. This was the programme:

Sonata, op. 30, No. 3. Piano and Violin. Beethoven.

Allegro assai. Temno di Menuetto.—Allegro.

Messrs. Hugo Leonhard and Julius Eichberg.

Hebrew Melodie, arranged by.....Rob. Franz.

For Piano and Violoncello.

Messrs. Hugo Leonhard and Wulf Fries.

Concerto, D minor, for two Violins.....Bach.

Vivace: Largo ma non troppo; Allegro.

Messrs. Julius Eichberg and Henry Suck.

Preludes, op. 28, No. 6, 1, 23, 15, 17.....Chopin.

Mr. Hugo Leonhard.

Trio, op. 63, D minor.....Schumann.

Allegro, Scherzo, Andante, Finale.

Messrs. Leonhard, Eichberg and Fries.

The fresh and buoyant Beethoven Sonata, with the complete abandon of its dance-like Finale, was most enlivening. The Melody which Robert Franz heard in a synagogue, may or may not be of old Hebrew origin, but it is beautiful, and bold where the minor opens into the major, and Franz has developed and enriched his theme by that fine instinct and consummate art he has of bringing out just what was in the germ. It was beautifully played.

The Bach Concerto was listened to with a sincere and deep delight; especially the exquisite slow movement, although one of the violins seemed not so alive to what it had to utter as the other. Mr. Leonhard presented his bouquet of Chopin Preludes (three of the five, at least, were quite familiar ones) in a most tasteful and appreciative manner; the last one has a singularly Mendelssohnian cut for Chopin. Of the magnificent Schumann Trio, we can only say that it was finely rendered and made a deep impression as usual.

The next Matinee will be on Friday, March 7.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB were greeted by a large and a responsive audience at the first of their Four Chamber Concerts, at the Meloson, last Saturday evening. The programme, in accordance with the whole plan of the series, made up mostly from the works of new composers, was as follows:

Quartet, No. 2, in E, op. 10.....Max Bruch.

Allegro Maestoso, Andante quasi Adagio, Vivace ma non troppo, Finale Vivace.

Sacred Air, "Pour out thy heart before the Lord,"

Molique.

Mr. Nelson Varley.

Trio, No. 3, in B flat. For Piano, Violin and Cello.

Bargiel.

Moderato, Andante, Scherzo, Allegro.

Elegie for Violoncello.....Bazzini.

Rudolph Hennig.

Quartet in A minor, Op. 29.....Franz Schubert.

Allegro ma non troppo, Andante Menuetto, Allegro.

We were only able to be present through the first two pieces, and we listened to those with sense of hearing so demoralized by winter winds and snow, that we could not tell whether we liked the Quartet by Bruch or not. It seemed to make a good impression. Of Mr. VARLEY it was clear enough that he never has sung more sweetly, purely and artistically, and the Air by Molique is truly beautiful and noble; you could almost fancy it to be one that Mendelssohn had left out from St. Paul. Mr. PERABO was the pianist in the Trio by Bargiel.—The second concert is to-night, and this is the programme:

Quartet in D minor, op. 77.....J. Raff.

Moderato, Vivace, Andante, Allegro.

Songs.

Miss Fairman.

Quartet Satz, in C minor, posthumous fragment.

Franz Schubert.

Hungarian Dances, composed by Brahms, arranged by Violin and Piano.....Joachim.

William Schultze.

Quintet in F, Op. 89.....Rubinstein.

Our New York letter comes too late for this week.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 25.—Mr. WOLFSOHN's seventh matinee, on Saturday afternoon, the 18th inst., was not very well attended, owing to the riotous state of the weather. The Symphony was Beethoven's first, which was remarkably well rendered. Indeed Mr. Wolfsohn's forte is his clear interpretation of this master's compositions. The Violin Concerto by Bruch is a very worthy production; but Mr. Stoll was not at all happy in his performance of it. The Tannhaeuser Overture was the only other work of importance on the programme; and I simply mention it to say how very inferior the execution of it was to the performance of the Symphony.

Mr. JARVIS gave the third soiree of his series at Chickering Hall on Saturday evening, Jan. 18. The programme began with Beethoven's Sonata in C minor, for piano and violin; the executants were Messrs. Jarvis and Guhle-mann. This latter gentleman was somewhat careless in his playing. But in the Adagio Cantabile the loveliness of the movement seemed to obliterate the performers entirely from notice. In the Mozart Trio, for piano, clarinet and viola, the gentlemen who played the last two instruments were very successful. Mr. Jarvis played Tausig's second "Soiree de Vienne" magnificently. In Vieuxtemps "Reverie" Mr. Guhle-mann redeemed himself entirely. The Schumann "Andante with Variations," for two pianos, was exquisitely yet forcibly given by Messrs. Jarvis and Guhle-mann.

On Thursday, the 23rd, THEO. THOMAS began a series of four concerts at the Academy of Music. The audience was not large, owing to the shocking weather. The programme was the same as was given by the Orchestra at their first concert in this city:

Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....	Wagner.
Allegretto, 8th Symphony.....	Beethoven.
Invitation à la Danse [Weber].....	Beethoven.
Polonaise in E major.....	Liszt.
Scherzo and March. "Midsummer Night's Dream".....	Mendelssohn.
Overture to "Wm. Tell".....	Rossini.
Träumerei.....	Schumann.
Danube Waltzes.....	Strauss.
Serenade for Flute and French Horn.....	Tritl.
Two Polkas.....	Strauss.
Fackeltanz, No. 1.....	Meyerbeer.

The Allegretto was redemanded, and certainly the Midsummer Night's Dream should have been, for the rendering was simply perfect. The Träumerei was of course encored, and Haydn's "Serenade" came out in acknowledgment of the compliment. Miss Mehlig was recalled after the Liszt Polonaise.

The second Concert began with Schumann's 3rd Symphony, in E flat. It was never before played here entire, and so to many of the audience it was a fresh treat. The whole work is eloquently grand: but grandest is the last movement: all through its solemn introduction one can see the sparkling theme, till, like the sun from an August fog, it bursts forth to obscure all its predecessors. Miss Mehlig followed with Chopin's F-Minor Concerto; all through the piece she forth the brilliant qualities of the true artist. Mr. Osgood sang three songs by Schubert. I am free to confess I do not like Mr. Osgood's singing; he lacks voice, and he slides so much as to render it at times positively tiresome. Mr. Jacobsohn played Ernst's "Otello" Fantasia with proper spirit and effect.

At the concert on Saturday afternoon this was the programme:

Introduction to the 3d Act of "Medea".....	Cherubini.
Twilight and Dryads' Dance, from "Im Walde".....	Raff.
C-sharp Minor Sonata.....	Beethoven.
"Manfred" Overture, op. 115.....	Schumann.
Ballet de Rienzi.....	Wagner.
Songs. "Spring Faith".....	Schubert.
"The Violet".....	Mozart.
Solo for Harp.....	Godefridt.
Illustrationen Walzer.....	Strauss.
Serenade: Solos for Violin, Clarinet, Flute & Oboe.....	Rossini.
Overture: "Fingal's Cave".....	Mendelssohn.

The selection from the Raff Symphony was delightful; the Twilight portion especially; so delicate and dreamy it is. The long and tiresome Rienzi Ballet was most beautifully rendered. Miss Mehlig played the "Moonlight" Sonata with true poetic feeling, but her "Allegretto" was a shade too slow. Mr. Osgood sang somewhat better than usual; the second song indeed was very satisfactory. The performance in the evening was, as to the orchestral part, entirely composed by works of Wagner. The programme began with the grand "Kaiser March." This was followed by the "Vorspiel" to Lohengrin. The "Vorspiel und Schluss-satz" from Tristan und Isolde were entirely new to me, nor were the themes agreeable. "Der Ritt Der Walkueren" [played from the Manuscript copy] was very well given. The "Huldigungs" march closed the orchestral part. Miss Mehlig played a cluster of Chopin's pieces charmingly, and Mr. Osgood's contribution of two Wagner songs [if songs they can be called] was quite acceptable. The Orchestra will, it is hoped, return to us in April.

FEB. 6.—Mr. WOLFSOHN's eighth Orchestral matinee took place at Horticultural Hall. Schumann's B-flat Symphony was the chief feature of the programme. It did not receive nearly so nice an interpretation, nor such skilful execution as Beethoven's No. 1 in the preceding week. The Larghetto, however, was tolerably well rendered. Weber's Freischütz Overture was given with great force and correctness. Mr. Wolfsohn played an Etude of Chopin's and Raff's "Valse Caprice," in his elegant and graceful style. Gounod's Saltarello, which closed the performance, was very pleasingly rendered.

On Tuesday, Jan. 28, "The Beethoven Society," composed entirely of amateurs, and conducted by Mr. Wolfsohn, gave an "Invitation Rehearsal" to their friends at Natatorium Hall. The chorus is composed of about 60 or 70 voices, nearly all cultivated. Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" was the principal selection. Generally the Mass was given with correctness, spirit and intelligence. The beautiful Gloria was exquisitely sung, as also was the Sanctus. The Credo was sung too fortissimo to make a good impression. The other choral pieces were: Two choruses from Mozart's "King Thamos"; "The Water-Lily" of Gade, and Schumann's Wanderlied (which have been sung by the society at every one of their concerts and hence need rest); Cherubini's "Slumber Song," and the Spinning Song of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," the last two by the female chorus, completed the choral part of the programme. Every number was well done except the "Flying Dutchman" chorus, which was quite bad. The parts of the choir are very well balanced, though the bass might be a trifle stronger. The tenors are strikingly good and telling, which is a marvel, for it is commonly the flimsy part of the choral structure of most societies. Miss Clara Lauderbach sang Beethoven's "Wonne der Wehmuth" and "Mignon" remarkably well. Her voice is pure and sweet throughout its entire range; her only fault is that her articulation is very imperfect in the upper register; at times it is impossible to appreciate the words. Miss L. also acquitted herself finely in the solo part in the Mass. Next Monday the "Creation" is to be given by the Handel & Haydn.

FEB. 14.—At Mr. Wolfsohn's ninth matinee, last Saturday afternoon, Beethoven's Symphony in F [No. 8] was given entire for the first time in Philadelphia. The performance was a thorough success; the celebrated and familiar "Allegretto Scherzando" being given with more taste and expression than it was by Theodore Thomas's orchestra at a very recent concert. Of course the technique of the latter was more perfect, but the being, the soul, if you please, came more home to one in the rendering of Mr. Wolfsohn. The rest of the orchestral part of the programme consisted of the Overture to "L'Etoile du Nord," of Meyerbeer; Strauss's "Wein, Weib und Gesang" (Waltz most beautifully rendered); and the March from "Midsummer Night's Dream." In every selection the steady improvement of the Orchestra was seen. The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Alfredo Barilli, the young New York pianist. His selection was Weber's Concert-stück, played here recently by Rubinstein. Of course to compare would be odious, but absolutely considered, Mr. Barilli's playing, although of a high order, lacks fervor and enthusiasm. He received a hearty encore.

On Monday evening last "Haydn's Creation" was recited at the Academy of Music to a tremendous audience. The solos were given by Mrs. Houston-West, Mr. Simpson and Mr. Aaron R. Taylor, the chorus being that of the Handel and Haydn Society, the whole under the baton of Mr. Carl Sentz. Mrs. West was thoroughly successful in her efforts. "On mighty Pens" was never so dramatically given here, but "With verdure clad" I have frequently heard with greater pleasure. The only fault that can be ascribed to Mrs. West is a physical one; it is that her upper notes are too "reedy," or, more correctly speaking, forced. In the second part her singing was delightful; it was so intelligent and honest. She is the only soprano I have ever heard sing the whole Oratorio. Mr. Simpson was also thoroughly good in his role. "In native worth" was superbly sung and was heartily encored. "Now vanish" he also sang with much warmth of expression. Mr. A. R. Taylor of our city assumed the Bass solos. Occasionally he showed the effects of his long absence from the concert room, but generally his singing was up to his old high standard. In the "Rolling and foaming Billows" his magnificent voice displayed itself to great advantage. In some passages he lacked fire; for example: "The flexible tiger appears" he sang with the same expression as "With heavy beasts the ground is trod." But in the duets in the second part he was all that could be desired.

It only remains to say of this performance that the chorus was feeble and unsteady generally; but "Achieved" and "The Heavens are telling" were fairly done. The Orchestra was simply outrageous. Mrs. West and Mr. Taylor were considerably fretted by their floundering, but Mr. Simpson did not appear to care and held himself steadily throughout.

Gossec.

[Translated from the French for Dwight's Journal of Music.]

II.

It did not require a long examination to convince Rameau that Gossec had not too highly vaunted the capacity of his pupil, and he then informed our two young people that he would that very day put their ability to the test. Gossec was to conduct the orchestra, while his wife should accompany on the harpsichord the score of his unpublished opera, La Guirlande.

"Now, my friends," said he to them, "I will give you an hour to glance at this music, and when you have examined it sufficiently, we will go to the rehearsal."

Just at this time the messenger sent by M. de la Popelinière had come, and Rameau, sure now that all would be well, had replied that they must wait patiently.

The two young artists had been occupied nearly an hour in studying the score placed before them, when they were interrupted in the midst of their task by the entrance of the costumer and the dress-maker, accompanied by Mme. Rameau. The latter had great difficulty in making the young couple understand that it was impossible for them to figure in a grand assembly in their mean, bourgeois costume; Gossec, especially, declared that a man presented and protected by the great Rameau ought to be welcomed anywhere without regard to the elegance of his dress.

Mme. Gossec was much easier to convince; the idea of seeing herself decked out for the first time like a great lady, with her hair dressed and powdered, pleased her excessively, and she assumed the various postures required by the dress-maker with infinite good will. The costumer had rather more trouble with the husband, who, absorbed in the study of his score, raised mechanically his arm or leg as the costumer desired in order to take his measure; but to all questions addressed to him about the choice of stuff, or the color or cut of coat or waistcoat, he replied only, "As you like;" "It is all the same to me!" The costumer and the dress-maker both promised that their tasks should be finished at the appointed hour, and Rameau conducted his two protégés to the Hôtel de la Popelinière.

It was by this time nearly noon. The musicians, who had been waiting since nine o'clock, were all in a sufficiently bad humor, and the presence of Rameau alone could keep them from expressing their displeasure in loud murmurs. Their discontent was still further increased by the presence of the new comers. There were in the orchestra several old musicians, whose conceit and irritability could be measured only by the smallness of their talent, and the idea of being conducted by an eighteen year old child, an entire stranger, only increased their ill feeling. Gossec placed himself at the music-stand, and at a signal given by him, upon the invitation of Rameau, the rehearsal commenced. At the very beginning the violins executed their part so negligently that they missed entirely a passage which was not without some importance and some difficulty. Gossec immediately made them repeat the passage; it was no better played than before.

"Gentlemen," said he to the musicians, "it is noon, and the concert commences at six o'clock; it depends only upon yourselves whether the rehearsal shall end in one hour; but as I wish above everything that the performance should be excellent, I warn you that I shall continue until we reach the desired perfection. This is very easy; time will not be wanting, as we have six hours before us."

An old musician then rose from his seat and, addressing the young leader, said: "That is very easy for you to say, monsieur, whose name I do not know, but that passage is badly fingered, and it cannot be played."

"Lend me your violin, monsieur," replied Gossec, coldly, and seizing the instrument which the musician handed him with a bad grace, he played the phrase with neatness and perfect finish. "You see, monsieur," he added, "that it is quite practicable; but perhaps you have not found the right position for executing that passage;" and he repeated the phrase, pointing out the position and the fingering.

From that moment the performers comprehended that they had found their match; they redoubled their care, their zeal and attention, and the rehearsal went on swimmingly. One more attempt was made to test, as they said, the new conductor. It came from a flutist, who rendered a phrase without style or grace. Before beginning again, Gossec said, addressing the flutist: "Please listen and hear how that phrase should be rendered; Madame will show you."

He then made a sign to his wife, who executed the phrase on the harpsichord with a taste and grace which won the involuntary applause of the most recalcitrant musicians.

At two o'clock the rehearsal terminated. The performers then approached Gossec. In laying down his bâton, he laid aside also the severity and coldness of manner which he believed his dignity required him to assume in order to impress his subordinates: his duties performed, he showed himself a thoroughly good fellow, and resumed his habitual air of gayety and good humor; he knew how by a few adroit compliments to attract those who appeared the least disposed to be friendly towards him. In a few minutes they all shook hands with him, protestations of devotion followed, and Gossec had no longer any but friends in the orchestra of M. de la Popelinière. During the rehearsal, Rameau kept aloof; buried in a large fauteuil, he left the field clear for his young chef d'orchestre; happy at seeing himself so well understood, so intelligently interpreted, he would not by a single observation weaken the authority of the new comer. But scarcely had Gossec escaped from his new friends, than he felt himself lifted from the ground and pressed in the arms of the celebrated musician, who embraced him with great warmth,

"I promised you some good news," said Rameau; "let us go to dinner; I will tell it you at table;" and the two young people accompanied him to his house.

The cloth was laid, and after the first few moments of silence always required for the satisfaction of the appetite: "Come," said Rameau, opening the conversation, "you have been recommended to me as a man of talent: I might distrust your master's friendship, but you have proved that he has not said too much. Now, what can I do for you? What resources have you in Paris?"

"Our resources are not very large," said Gossec; "we started from Antwerp the possessors of one hundred crowns, our savings for one year, having both of us given lessons and hoarded our means with great care. We have already spent more than half that sum; but with your protection lessons cannot fail us, and, God and our youth on our side, I hope we shall be able to live in Paris."

"Lessons, lessons," said Rameau, "they are all very well, but first of all you need a regular salary to raise you above want. Besides, you wish to be a composer, to make a name for yourself; can you do that when your whole time will be absorbed by your pupils? I followed that occupation for thirty years, and during those thirty years it kept me from succeeding. It was necessary that a generous protector, the same to whom I shall present you this evening, should come to my assistance, in order, not that I might emerge from obscurity, for I had already attained some celebrity by means of my theoretical works, but that I might show the world what I had received from God. All this came to me rather late, but I have no right to complain, quite the contrary. However, I can help you to avoid the struggles and trials that I have endured. An established and almost independent position can be offered you at once. Would you like to be the conductor of M. de la Popelinière's concerts? Once a week you will have to conduct a concert at his hôtel, and on Sundays during the summer to have masses and motets performed in the chapel of his chateau at Passy. For this you will have eighteen hundred livres a year."

"Ah! my wife!" cried Gossec, and instead of thanking Rameau, he threw himself on his wife's neck, embracing her with rapture.

The little woman, blushing and ashamed, drew back hastily.

"How can you, my dear," said she, "before monsieur, to whom you do not think of expressing your gratitude."

"Madame is right," said Rameau, "it is I whom you ought to embrace; but I will dispense with it willingly, for I hope that Madame will be more just and more grateful than you are, when she learns that she on her part will receive twelve hundred livres a year as harpsichordist at the concerts in Paris and organist of the chapel at Passy."

Willing or not, Rameau now had to receive the embraces of both the young people, intoxicated with happiness and joy.

Amidst this overflow of feeling the dinner came to an end. At four o'clock the costumer, the dress-maker and the hair-dresser appeared, punctual to their appointment. The two costumes were complete, and in their new dress our young people were altogether charming. The costumer could not, in so short a time, have completed an entire outfit, had not the wardrobe of the Opera come to his aid. He had only to adapt to the slight figure of Gossec a suit which smacked a little of the shepherd, but which was in no way ridiculous, thanks to the youth and good looks of the wearer. Rameau appeared in his customary grave costume, a coat of Terry velvet of a color bordering on brown, with bright steel buttons, a white waistcoat which set off the great cordon of Saint Michel, with which he had been decorated, black silk breeches, stockings of the same, and shoes with gold buckles. At half-past five one of M. de la Popelinière's carriages came to convey them to the hotel, where a large part of the company were already assembled.

At that period the hotels of the financiers were the great centres of pleasure and enjoyment. Artists and men of letters were habitual guests, and the flower of the nobility were constantly to be found there. The superiority of these assemblies over those exclusively aristocratic, resulted from the fact that the great lords were admitted less on account of their rank than for their personal merit or their decided taste for the arts. The line of demarcation between men of intelligence and those who had no titles but those of birth, was so thoroughly accepted that the latter never feared compromising, by familiarity, a dignity which no one thought of contesting. The relations of the great lords with artists were a thousand times more agreeable than they have been since, now that artists find themselves in contact with men who are always afraid that the superiority of their position will not be recognized unless they make it felt by their attitude and the distance they maintain between themselves and those whom they regard as inferiors.

After the concert, which was as successful as he could have hoped, and during the interval between the music and supper, Rameau presented Gossec and his wife to M. de la Popelinière. The latter graciously confirmed the appointment which Rameau had already announced to them. Then, the poor little woman finding herself very uncomfortable in the midst of all this brilliant company who gazed at her with a rather embarrassing curiosity, Rameau took her by the hand, and approaching a personage decorated like himself with the order of Saint Michel:

"My dear friend," said he to him, "will you permit me to present to your wife this young person, who knows no one here but her husband and myself? She is a very distinguished artiste, whom Mme. Vanloo will be delighted to know, and for whom I am going to entreat her protection."

Carle Vanloo* hastened to conduct the young woman to Mme. Vanloo.

Mme. Vanloo was a very beautiful person whom Vanloo had married in Italy. The daughter of a celebrated musician of that country, she herself had great ability as a singer, and, although the Italian style was far from being generally adopted in France, she was the wonder and the idol of the salons in which she allowed herself to be heard. Carle Vanloo was then forty-six years of age; he was passionately fond of his wife, who was much younger than himself. He had received very little education, scarcely knowing how to read and write; but he had great natural abilities. Constant association with good society had given him an ease of manner which concealed all the disadvantages resulting from his want of education; besides, his talents gave him a superiority which might serve as an excuse, if he needed one, and his personal merit and his wife's accomplishments attracted to him the best society. The acquaintance of Mme. Vanloo was therefore a very valuable one to Mme. Gossec, and the two young women found in the similarity of their taste for the art in which they excelled, sufficient motives for laying the foundations of a connection, which very soon assumed the proportions of a genuine friendship.

Gossec had commenced a conversation with a gentleman ten years his senior, who seemed to be a congenial spirit. They talked of music and literature, at that time the constant topics of conversation. Gossec wished to talk of poetry, the stranger of music only. He appeared to be a great partisan of the Italian school, and Gossec, while acknowledging its beauties, defended the French musicians and declaimed with special fury against Rousseau, who, after insisting that good music could not be written to French words, had signally contradicted himself by publishing his Devin du Village, the success of which had made a great noise. While declaiming against Rousseau, he pronounced the name of Voltaire.

"I have had great good fortune," he added. Scarcely arrived in Paris, I have obtained the protection of the greatest living French musician. Nothing is now wanting but to know the greatest poet and philosopher."

"Perhaps," said his interlocutor, "I shall one day be able to procure you that gratification."

"Are you acquainted with M. de Voltaire?"

"Certainly, I have this very day received a letter from him. Would you like to see it?"

Gossec seized the letter eagerly and read the superscription:

"To Monsieur de Marmontel."

Marmontel was one of the young men to whom Voltaire was most partial. Scarcely thirty years old, he had already obtained the most brilliant success. After carrying off three times the prize at the Jeux Floraux at Toulouse, he presented himself in 1746 as competitor for the poetical prize of the French Academy. The subject given for competition was, "The glory of Louis XIV. perpetuated in his successor." Marmontel was crowned, nor was he less successful in 1747. The subject was nearly the same: "The clemency of Louis XIV. is one of the virtues of his successor." It will be seen that at that time the Academy was not desirous of introducing any great variety into its subjects for competition. The following year, 1748, Marmontel gave his tragedy, Denys le Tyran, and had the honor of being called upon the stage, a triumph never before enjoyed but once, by Voltaire after the representation of his tragedy of Mérope. At supper, which was very gay and lively, Gossec seated himself beside Marmontel, and from that day were formed between them the bonds of a friendship which death alone was able to sever.

Returning to their modest lodging, our two young friends thought they must have been dreaming. They had risen in the morning poor, strangers in Paris, with no support, no protector, only the most uncertain future before them; at night they found themselves launched into the great world, their maintenance assured to them, and occupying a position, to which, even in their dreams, they would scarcely have ventured to aspire.

"Well, little wife," cried Gossec, as they entered, "what do you say to all that has happened to us?"

"I say that God is very good to us, but he could not be otherwise, we love each other so much!"

The next day, Gossec, who applied himself seriously to his new duties, wished to make himself familiar with the repertoire of the concerts he was called on to conduct. This repertoire was not very extensive: it was limited to a few pieces for the harpsichord, the best of which were those of Couperin and Rameau, a few Sonatas for the violin and for the orchestra, the Overtures to the operas of Lully and Rameau, and especially the dance music of the latter. This, it must be admitted, was charming, and was so much in vogue that it was performed in every country in Europe, even in those where great dislike for French music was displayed. In Italy, for nearly a whole century, composers wrote no symphonies to precede their operas. The Overtures of Lully and Rameau were generally acknowledged as models of this style, which one ought not even to attempt to imitate. Gossec, however, knew well that, however pleasing dance music might be, and whatever interest might attach to the fugue pieces they called overtures, he had a more important part for the orchestra to fill; he desired to create and did create concert-music. In 1754, after three years of repeated trials and continued study, he gave his first Symphony. By a singular chance, during the very year in which he, as he thought, was inventing that style, Haydn wrote his first Symphony, followed by so many others. But it was not until twenty years later that these immortal master-pieces became known in France, and during that period Gossec reigned supreme, and the title of King of Symphony was accorded to him without dispute. The success of Gossec's Symphonies was not at first as great as his compositions merited. The usual audiences at M. de la Popelinière's concerts were too much accustomed to the antiquated forms of the pieces with which they had so long been lulled, to allow themselves to be charmed by such bold innovations as those of Gossec. The

* Painter of the last century.

Symphonies, before they could gain public favor, had to be repeatedly executed at the sacred concerts which were given at the Tuileries during those periods set apart for religious observances when the theatres were closed. Meanwhile Rameau was growing old and wrote no more. M. de la Popelinière was a fanatical partisan of Rameau, and when the master ceased to compose, the protector withdrew his bounty and dismissed the orchestra, which he had maintained for twenty-five years, as soon as he for whom he had created it could no longer supply it with his own compositions. Happily for Gossec his reputation had increased, and scarcely had he been discharged by M. de la Popelinière than he was received by the Prince de Conti as his musical director, with pecuniary advantages superior to those he had lost. He profited by the leisure afforded him by his new employment, and in 1759 published his first quartets. This was a style of composition as yet unknown in France, which also he can claim to have created. The success of these quartets was such that in two years the edition was counterfeited simultaneously at Liege, at Amsterdam and at Mannheim.

The history of musicians offers, generally, but little interest, except when treating of their early years and of their first appearance in public. Nothing is more curious than the diversity of means employed to clear that immense barrier which separates their primitive obscurity from the celebrity they acquire in the end. But, this first obstacle once surmounted, the end is almost attained, and the careers of all artists resemble each other; their history is to be found entire in the catalogues of their works. Gossec's life offers no further interest except through the multiplicity of his works; it is therefore to a sketch of these, so to speak, that my narrative will hereafter be limited.

Gossec had already created instrumental music in France; it was his lot also to bring about an immense improvement in religious music. Only the works of Lalande, Campra, Mondonville, Bernier, and a few others less celebrated, were performed in the numerous churches and communities which maintained companies of musicians and singers. The chapel-masters were, it is true, composers, and did not fail to have their own works performed by the choirs which they directed; but these works were rarely known outside of the narrow circle for which they were written. A great work was still wanting which should combine all the qualities desired in that style of composition. The composers already named had written only motets, which were performed at Versailles at low mass; thence they passed to the sacred concert and to certain cathedrals where they were adopted, but there could not then be cited a single complete mass by any celebrated master. In 1760, Gossec's famous Mass for the Dead was performed at Saint-Roch; this marks a new epoch. The work was printed, and remained the only specimen of that style of composition until the Requiem of Mozart became known in France thirty years later. It was, I think, at the obsequies of Grétry, in 1813, that Gossec's mass was performed for the last time in that same church of Saint-Roch, where, fifty-three years previously it had been heard for the first time.

The Voice, and how to Use it.

BY W. H. DANIELL.

[From the Worcester Palladium.]

IV.

Pupil. Before proceeding with the question of power, will you explain more clearly what you mean by the different positions taken in different registers? I am afraid I do not quite understand about them.

Mr. D. Well, let me make it as clear as I can. I have said that all sound was the effect of vibration of something. For a familiar example let us take the violin; it is an instrument having four strings for the vibratory medium. They are G, D, A, E; when tuned properly, the G being the lowest, and the E the highest. Now any given tone may be produced by a fixed number of vibrations in a second; but those vibrations may be produced equally well by a long string, or by a short string having greater weight. The G string is a heavy string, wound with silver thread to increase its weight. The D, A, and E strings are successively smaller and not wound, there being no necessity. Now the A may be produced by the large G, or by the small A string; only in the first instance, the proper number of vibrations must be gained by shortening the string. Now it would be unnatural for the violinist to use the low string for all the notes that can be got from it, before going to the next; on the contrary he uses each string for a certain number of notes and no more, passing to other strings for greater ease.

Pupil. Then the strings represent the registers.

Mr. D. Not too fast; that is not my point. I simply wish to convey the idea that, having obtained a certain number of tones from one string, it is far easier to gain successive tones on other strings than to continue on the first; but this is merely preliminary. The voice is produced by vibration of what we have termed, for convenience, the vocal chord. This is an opening in the throat which can be easily imitated by placing your hands together, letting the palms and tips of the fingers come together. Then by slightly bending the forefingers, you have the opening of the larynx as shown in the ordinary use of the voice in speaking. As the voice ascends, this opening closes more and more. Now you see that the whole extent of the muscle vibrates. Having reached a certain point, which I indicate as F, G, the muscle is shortened, that is, the lower part, for about one-quarter or one-third the distance, is entirely closed, while the upper part remains open. Thus the vibratory part of the muscle is shortened. The same action then takes place as before, until arrival at about D, E, when again a shortening takes place, and only about one third of the muscle vibrates. In the male voice this extreme shortening produces the falsetto tone, while in the female voice it becomes the upper register. In speaking of upper and lower parts of the muscle, I am speaking of it as if shown on paper. The upper part should be more properly termed the front, and the lower the back part of the chord.

Pupil. Do you advocate the use of the falsetto tone in the male voice? It is generally considered wrong, is it not?

Mr. D. It is generally regarded as something to be avoided, but I doubt whether it is wise to give it up. It is certainly most necessary to possess the ability to produce it. In former times it was regarded as much a part of the voice as any other, and you see for yourself that the action is natural. At all events, it is most useful in forming and developing tone. We have yet, however, to overcome the prejudice in favor of the splendid, shouting high C, which is the great object to be attained in the minds of most tenors. That same splendid note, so much desired, may not be the greatest blessing to any conscientious singer. It cannot be indulged in with safety. I have quoted Salvi as a model. He never sang a high C like Lefranc, but he was an infinitely greater artist, and his high notes were pleasanter to listen to, in my opinion. You must see from what I have shown above, of the working of the muscle, that such high notes, shouted, can only be obtained in a forced, unnatural way and at the ultimate expense of the organ.

Pupil. But the audience applaud these startling much more than they do the softer ones. Should not the singer aim to please all that he can?

Mr. D. The audiences always applaud what is simply startling, more than the simply artistic. People like sensation. Applause is not the best test of merit, or even of appreciation. I knew a singer at one time to sing the beautiful contralto song "He was despised," from the "Messiah." There was no applause after it, but I saw a great many handkerchiefs in use. Was not that a higher compliment than clapping of hands? I think so. Homage is always intoxicating, and public applause is homage to a certain extent. Public singers and actors are dearly fond of it, and for that reason will sacrifice art to obtain it. Audiences are in a measure to blame for the introduction of "clap-trap" into singing, and "gags" in acting. It all proceeds from a longing for applause. No matter what kind of applause, whether judicious or not; and there is not as much judicious applause as one could wish. Few people realize how little sincerity, even, there is in most applause. A few persons scattered over a house can get up an encore without difficulty. But startling notes will generally gain the desired end without assistance.

Pupil. Then you deprecate the use of such high tones?

Mr. D. I deprecate the use of clap-trap of any kind. Let the singer learn to deal fairly with the composer and strive to render his music in the truest and best manner, and think of himself only as the vehicle of the composer's thoughts. But generally the composer must take the second place. Even in the drama, dress takes the place of good acting. No, be not you one of those to cater to a vitiated taste! Be content to do everything well and conscientiously, and gain applause rather by well doing, than by sensational doing.

V.

Pupil. You have described three positions of the vocal chord, taken in different parts of the voice. Are these changes abrupt from one to another?

Mr. D. They are usually, with the voice as commonly used. They should not be allowed, however, to be abrupt, unless one wishes to accomplish what is termed "yodeling," which is a distinctive peculiarity of Tyrolean singing. It is evident that good taste should lead one to sing as smoothly, not as roughly, as possible. Let us classify these changes, using the tenor voice. The muscle will vibrate throughout its length to D, then it will close for about one-third its distance, so that two-thirds will vibrate until arrival at about G, which is the usual limit of the tenor voice. Then it will close for two-thirds its length, and the falsetto voice be produced, which will run up to a great distance. Let us term the lower register No. 1, and the others successively 2 and 3. Instead of allowing the muscle to suddenly contract between D and E, it may be favored so as to gradually shade from 1 to 2—that is, a gradual contraction may be induced by running No. 2 down to about C; after some practice, the muscle becomes educated to act in a gradual manner. So with the change from 2 to 3; No. 3 must be run down even as low as E, and the tone thereby become educated as in the first instance. It is most unartistic to allow an abrupt change; the effect of this last will be that the voice is enabled to go higher than G with an easy action of the muscle.

Pupil. But will the upper tones so made ever become strong and ringing? I do not doubt that they may be clear and penetrating; but supposing you were to sing "Thou shalt break them," or "Sound an alarm," songs requiring vigorous tones on A, would you use that delivery of tone?

Mr. D. No, I should not. In such cases I should carry No. 2 up for the tone.

Pupil. But how then? Do you not say that the muscle becomes strained in so doing?

Mr. D. No, I have not said so. I instanced the fact that on the violin the A could be produced on the low G, as well as on the A string, and the case is somewhat similar here. The voice should never be carried to its extreme in any register. Even though you change, there is still the ability to do more than is actually done. Now in such songs as you have instanced, it is necessary for the voice to ring out like a clarion. Position No. 2 may then be properly maintained, but very carefully. The danger is in using that position too frequently. It is tempting to a singer, and frequently injury is done by overtaxing the very delicate organ. The character of tones should be carefully maintained at all times. One great use of the falsetto is to induce the muscle to act easily and flexibly, for just such occasions—but I think the lighter character of tone preferable for common use.

Pupil. And how with bass voices—are they governed in the same way?

Mr. D. The bass voice changes from 1 to 2 at about C, D. I think the change should always take place at that point. The great Baritone, Badiali, always sang in that manner, under all circumstances.

I never heard him emit one of those bawling tones which baritones and basses of the present day so much affect. When No. 1 is carried up to D and E, the effect is startling in the extreme, and to my mind, by no means pleasant. Did you hear Santley? There was a model singer. No bawling was ever heard from him; but the registers followed each other so perfectly, that no change was noticeable.

Pupil. But one must then constantly keep in mind these divisions, or else be in constant danger of violating rule.

Mr. D. By no means. A little care, and these divisions take care of themselves. It becomes a perfectly natural thing to take a given tone in a certain manner, and you find that the voice really takes care of itself. This seems strange, I know; but, to instance a case:—Some pupils of mine one day asked if there was not something about the proper delivery of tone which they had not known, as a certain singer had claimed to be able to strike any given note with certainly, meaning that she could strike it with precision without stopping to think how it was to be done. I asked them if they could not do the same. They thought not. Very well. I immediately struck middle C, then the octave, then E, and finally upper G, all of which they sang unerringly. I asked them if they experienced any difficulty, and they replied in the negative, yet they had taken notes apart, and in different registers. They realized then, that the voice would really act properly without thought on their part.

Pupil. But if this matter is thus simple, why have people lectured and written on the subject in such a blind way? It is really tiresome to read most of the lectures on the subject.

Mr. D. I do not know. It is as much a mystery to me as to you. I do not think that any form of instruction is made sufficiently simple. I trust I am not so egotistic as to believe that I can at once explain away difficulties that have long puzzled wise men and deep thinkers on the subject, but I trust that I am able to clearly represent what passes in my own mind. Much of what I have said, you will not find in any books. Many of the ideas are obtained from careful study on my own part, and conversing with the best and most successful teachers. I say best, as well as most successful, for success does not always argue goodness. But I desire to have every proposition that I advance appeal to the common-sense. I believe that no statement of the teacher should be received without being reasoned upon. As you know, I always encourage questioning and am always ready to explain what may not seem clear. It is something hard, however, to so put thought into language, as to have it perfectly express the desired idea. But let us carefully examine all things.

DEATH OF AN ENGLISH COMPOSER. The Musical World, of Feb. 8, has the following:

A few days since the news of the death of Dr. Henry Hugh Pierson was received from Leipzig, where, we believe, he had for some time been residing. Dr. Pierson was born at Oxford in 1815, his father being a clergyman of high position. As, however, he is known to the English public by his musical achievements only, it will suffice to add that his first instructor was Thomas Attwood, Mozart's favorite English pupil, an intimate friend of Mendelssohn, and predecessor of Sir John Goss as organist of St. Paul's; that he subsequently was advised by Ferdinand Paer, "the writer of a hundred operas," who preceded Rossini as director of the Italian Opera, and Cherubini as director of the Conservatoire in Paris; that, in the University of Cambridge, he studied counterpoint with the late Doctor Walmisley; that he completed his musical education under Rinck, organist and composer for the organ, Tomaschek of Prague, and Reissiger of Dresden—all in their way more or less famous; and that the number of his works is considerable, including secular and operatic, as well as exclusively sacred pieces. He lived a great deal abroad, and chiefly in Germany, where, in Hamburg, Berlin, and other cities, some of his most important compositions were produced. In this country Dr. Pierson is principally remembered by his oratorio, Jerusalem, first heard at the Norwich Festival of 1852, under the direction of Mr. (now Sir Julius) Benedict, and afterwards in Exeter Hall; by his music to the second part of Goethe's Faust, a selection from which was given also at Norwich in 1857; and by his oratorio, Hezekiah, parts of which were introduced at the Norwich Festival of 1869. If not precisely a man of genius, Dr. Pierson was one who regarded his art with real earnestness, who would have disdained, for any amount of popularity, to trifle with it, and who spared no thought or pains to make whatever he attempted as good as he could possibly hope to make it. For this alone he is entitled to the respect of all serious workers. We may add, as postscript, that, in 1841, Dr. Pierson was elected, after the retirement of the late Sir Henry Bishop, to the musical chair in the University of Edinburgh, a post now honorably filled by Professor Oakeley.

THE STAR-SPANGLED BANNER.—Mr. Chappell, in a recent number of Notes and Queries, places on record the fact that this air is by John Stafford Smith, gentleman of His Majesty's Chapel Royal, who lived in the latter half of the last century. The original words were "To Anacreon in heaven," written by Ralph Tomlinson, and set to music by Smith for the Anacreontic Society, which held very jovial meetings at the Crown and Anchor, in the Strand. Stafford Smith's glees: "Blest pair of Syrens," and "Hark! the hollow woods," are well known. Mr. Chappell feels no doubt whatever about the authorship of the music.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. On Monday evening Mme. Schumann made her first appearance for the season, and was received with the accustomed favor. The accomplished pianist, on whose performances the interest of the evening was naturally concentrated, selected for her solo display, as on previous occasions, the second Sonata of Beethoven's set of three, Op. 31—viz., that in D minor, which has been proclaimed by eminent German critics the "dramatic sonata, par excellence," and if the keys of the pianoforte can represent "dramatic" impressions, there is no example to be cited by which such impressions are more powerfully suggested. A distinguished quality of Mme. Schumann's playing, apart from her universally acknowledged skill as a mistress of the instrument in all its mechanical requirements, is her power of realizing the ideas of a composer, whatever conditions may have influenced him during the process of composition. Hence she is essentially a genuine interpreter of Beethoven, who, of all writers for the pianoforte, was the most imaginative and the least mechanical. We need not describe over and over again Mme. Schumann's reading of the D-minor Sonata, one of the most peculiarly individual emanations from the genius of Beethoven. In the impassioned Allegro with which it begins, the melodious and pathetic Adagio and the Allegretto, its concluding movement, she was equally at home. At the end of the performance she was unanimously applauded, and twice called back to the platform; but instead of repeating Beethoven's finale, she played a romanza—one of a set of four characteristic pieces by Robert Schumann. How Mme. Schumann plays her late husband's music need hardly be stated, and never did she give her whole soul to it with more enthusiasm than in her execution on Monday night of the pianoforte part in the well-known D-minor trio. Her associates were Mme. Norman-Neruda and Signor Piatti, who, to judge by their playing, heartily sympathized with the gifted pianist. In short, Mme. Schumann impressed her audience as of old.

The quartets were Mozart's in B flat, one of the set of six dedicated to Haydn, and Haydn's in E flat, perhaps the finest of the ten he composed in that key. Both were played to perfection by Mme. Neruda, Herr L. Ries, M. Zerbini, and Sig. Piatti. Every amateur of genuine and sterling music for the chamber must be gratified to find that the director, Mr. Arthur Chappell, is paying more and more attention to the quartets of that most consummate of all quartet writers, Haydn. During the present series of concerts he has brought forward several specimens of the master hitherto unknown to the greater number of those who habitually frequent St. James's Hall, and not one has been heard without unqualified pleasure.

The singer was Mlle. Nita Gaetano, who gave extremely well an air by Pergolesi, and created a sensation in a new and charming song, by Mr. George Osborne—"The Robin and the Miden"—obtaining a well-merited recall. Sir Julius Benedict was the accompanist. At the next concert Herr Joseph Joachim is to make his first appearance for the season.—Times, Feb. 11.

A "SCHUBERT FESTIVAL" made one of the Crystal Palace Concerts, Feb. 1, the composer's birthday, with this programme:

Overture, "Rosamunde".....Schubert.
Part Song, "Night in the Forest"....."
Symphony, No. 8, in B flat (MS)....."
Romance, "Der Vollmond strahlt" (Rosamunde)....."
Hymn, "O Lord our God"....."
Pianoforte Concerto in F minor, op. 16.....Henselt.
Aria, "O vago suol" (Ugonotti).....Meyerbeer.
Part Song, "The Gondolier".....Schubert.
Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber.

The overture to "Rosamunde," written for the melodrama of "The Tragic Harp" (A.D. 1823), has been frequently played at the Palace, being always agreeably recognizable by the sprightly theme of the allegro. The ballet music of "Rosamunde" should not be neglected. The first part-song in E major, not remarkably striking for Schubert, but a good specimen of "Wald" music, derived color and character from the subdued accompaniment of the horns. The "Gondolier" song was accompanied on the pianoforte. The hymn for quartet and chorus, "The Song of the Swan," because composed in 1828, a few months before Schubert's death, has a beautiful accompaniment of wind instruments, including a pair of oboes, clarionets, bassoons, trumpets and horns, with 8 trombones. The charming romance from "Rosamunde," the only solo in the work, was sung by Mme. Lemmens with a true sense of the verbal text. The orchestral accompaniments were discovered by Mr. Grove at Vienna, and were snugly stowed away in a cupboard! "Credat Judeus, erubescat Christianus." And now for the symphony: Schubert, like his great friend and contemporary, has left nine, composed between 1813 and 1828, the year of his decease. This symphony (No. 6) follows the "Tragic" symphony in C minor (both produced in 1816), and precedes the one in C (February 1818). Mr. Grove who has reason to believe that the symphony was never played in public before Saturday last, describes the original autograph. It is a small oblong paper of dusky color, 16 staves to a page, the ink much browned. The MS. was begun with a new quill pen, which wore to a stump before the end of the andante. Schubert however, went on with it to the end of the trio, and then began the finale with a new one! Those who are familiar with Schubert's individual style, so strikingly revealed in the 9th symphony, and in his latest solo sonatas for the pianoforte, will be surprised at the strict observance of form, the simplicity of the themes, and the straightforward character of the whole work, never excursive, and adhering to the main text as a cautious navigator of ancient times would hug the coasts of the Mediterranean. With every claim to originality, the impress of Haydn was unmistakable, not only in the style of writing, but in the turns of thought and cheerful placidity of temperament. Particularly may these characteristics be discerned in the expressive andante (E flat) diversified by an extreme modulation and a new form of accompaniment, whilst the melody is enunciated in alternate phrases by the strings and the wind instruments. The minuet in G minor recalls to mind the fine third movement (same key) of Mozart's grandest symphony. The finale, once more, might pass for Haydn's, but the gaiety and sprightliness of "Papa" in this case are not unmingled with the old fashioned and antique airs of grandpapa à la pigtail. The instrumentation of the fifth symphony is ingenious, and the work undoubtedly denotes a "period" in the composer's career. It was admirably played by the Crystal Palace band.

BRITISH ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY.—The programme of this society's fifth concert was as follows:—

Symphony, No. 3, A minor, Scottish—Mendelssohn; Song, "The Wanderer" (Mr. Lewis Thomas)—Schubert; Song, MS. "Over the roof and over the wall," Sappho's Necklace (Miss Edith Wynne)—Sullivan; Overture (first time) to Shakespeare's Winter Tale (composed expressly for this society)—John Frances Barnett; Song, "Rose, softly blooming," Azor and Zemira (Miss Julia Elton)—Spohr; Song, "The shades of evening close around" (Mr. E. Lloyd)—F. Clay; Grand polonaise in E flat, pianoforte (Miss Katharine Evans)—Chopin; Quartet, "God is a Spirit," Woman of Samaria (Miss Edith Wynne, Miss Julia Elton, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. Lewis Thomas)—W. S. Bennett; Overture, Egmont—Beethoven.

MME. ARABELLA GODDARD, for twenty years the English favorite among pianists, has given her "Farewell Concert" in London. The Morning Advertiser says of it:

In the course of a few weeks Mme. Arabella Goddard will be on her way to Australia. She will go to the Colonies as the representative pianist of the old country, and the presence of such a perfect artist can do no less than exercise a beneficial effect upon the musical taste of the community on the other side of the world. Mme. Goddard can ill be spared from London; for, although pianoforte players abound, there are few who unite in themselves every quality which constitutes a really great artist. There are degrees of excellence in pianists as in poets and painters, and a truly perfect development in either is a rare exception. So it must always remain; and the departure, for a considerable period, of one allowed to be irreproachable as an exponent of classical music, will leave a gap very difficult to fill up. Madame Arabella Goddard's way is prepared for her in the Australian Colonies, or wherever she may go; and we cannot doubt that musical culture in the most remote English-speaking countries or dependencies is sufficiently advanced to make her triumph sure and certain. The good-will of the English public will follow her, and will be accompanied by wishes for her speedy return; though some time must elapse ere Mme. Goddard can be heard again in London. A voyage to Australia is a very different thing from a few weeks' trip to America; but whenever the lady may reappear after her colonial expedition, it will not be a day too soon for her many admirers at home. On Tuesday night last Mme. Goddard bade farewell to London at a concert arranged on the model of the Monday Populars. St. James's Hall was the locality, and the audience was more than ordinarily numerous. Haydn's Quartet in F, for strings, Op. 77, No. 2, was played Mr. Carrodus, Herr L. Ries, Mr. Zerbini, and Signor Piatti, with the exception of that admirable violinist, Mr. Carrodus, a familiar Monday Popular group of artists. The same composer's Trio in G major, for piano, violin, and cello, was played by Mme. Goddard, Mr. Carrodus, and Signor Piatti. Woelff's Sonata, "Ne Plus Ultra," Op. 41, was the solo chosen by Mme. Arabella Goddard, who first introduced it at the Monday Populars. Naturally enough the pianist was heard at her best on Tuesday night, and her rendering of the Sonata was as perfect an example of pianoforte playing as can well be conceived. The passages of double notes for both hands in the Allegro moderato were given with clearness, precision, and a deliciously crisp touch. Nothing was lost, slurred, or compromised; and the whole performance of this movement was a triumph of art. The variations on "Life let us cherish" were also given with every possible gradation of light and shade, and the third in particular served to show the pianist's extreme delicacy of touch. A storm of applause followed the performance, and Mme. Goddard, being summoned to the platform a second time, responded to the compliment with Thalberg's arrangement of "Home, sweet home." The pianist was again heard, with Signor Piatti, in Mendelssohn's fine Sonata in D major for pianoforte and violoncello.

PESTH.—The Abbate Franz Liszt has fixed his quarters here for the present. Contrary to his usual custom, he will give one public Liszt Evening this month, and another in March. His object in taking this step is to assist a well-known German composer, who is suffering from an incurable disease, and for whom Herr Joachim, also, lately gave a concert.

STUTTGART.—The Conservatory of Music, which is under the patronage of the King, received, last autumn, 170 new pupils. The number of pupils at the present moment is 488, being 35 more than last year. Of these, 177—namely 61 males, and 116 females—intend following music as a profession. 243 pupils belong to Stuttgart; 28 are from other parts of Würtemberg; 16 from Baden; 5 from Bavaria; 22 from Prussia; 1 from Alsace; 3 from the Saxon Duchies; 2 from Bremen; 3 from Hamburg; 7 from Austria; 32 from Switzerland; 4 from France; 54 from Great Britain and Ireland; 9 from Russia; 1 from the Danubian Principalities; 1 from Turkey; 2 from Spain; 51 from North America; 2 from Africa; and 2 from Australia.—A monster concert has been given in the Theatre Royal for the benefit of the victims of the inundations in the Baltic. The performers were members of all the military bands in the Würtemberg Army Corps. The idea was started by Lieutenant General von Stülpnagel. An orchestra about 240 strong was formed from the bands of seven line regiments, one of which is quartered in Alsace, four cavalry regiments, the artillery brigade, and the pioneers; to these were added some fifty drummers and fifers. The opening piece in the first part of the programme was dedicated to the King of Würtemberg; that in the second to the Emperor of Germany; both pieces were played in full uniform, the performers wearing their helmets, which they laid aside when executing the other pieces in the programme. Herr Saro, of Berlin, conducted. The Court was present during the whole of the concert, which, in consequence of its great success, will probably be repeated.

PARIS.—The programme of Pasdeloup's Popular Concert, Jan 19, contained: Symphony in D, Beethoven; Andante from 49th Symphony, Haydn; Symphony in B flat, Schumann; Violin Concerto in E, Vieuxtemps, played by M. Maubin; Overture to Semiramide, Rossini.—The concert of Jan. 26 offered the Symphonic music composed by M. G. Bizet on L'Artésienne, and a first hearing of the Overture to Ivan Soussanine, an opera by the Russian composer Glinka (born in 1803, died at Berlin in 1867).

In the concert of Feb. 2, M. Pasdeloup celebrated the quadruple anniversary of Mozart, Auber, Hérold and Schubert. Consequently his programme included the Overtures to Masaniello and Zampa; fragments of a Quintet by Mozart, and the great Schubert Symphony in C. The only composer on the programme who was not born in January was Beethoven, whose D-minor Symphony (the Ninth!) was also given. But has not the singer of Fidèle a right in all the festivals? inquires Le Ménestrel.—The selections for Feb. 9 were: Symphony in F by Gouvy; Largo from Haydn's 79th Quartet; Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Violin Concerto in A, by Saint-Saëns, played by M. Sarasate; Overture to "Merry Wives," Nicolai.

The fifth concert of the Société des Concerts, at the Conservatoire, presented Beethoven's second Symphony; Chorus from Lull's Armide; violin Concerto by Saint-Saëns, executed by M. Tolbecque; Chorus from Psyché, by Ambroise Thomas; Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Hallelujah from Handel's Messiah.—For Sunday, Feb. 9, the programme was as follows: Beethoven's Choral Symphony; Rondo and Bourrée from Bach's Suite in B minor; Aria from Don Giovanni, sung by Mlle. Fidès Devries; unaccompanied chorus by Mendelssohn; Overture to Freyshütz.

The following lyric pieces were put on the Parisian stage during 1872:

Fantasio, Offenbach, 3 acts, Opéra-Comique; Le Roi Carotte, opéra-bouffe-féerie, 4 acts, Gaîté; Une Fête à Venise, opéra-bouffe, F. Ricci, 4 acts, Athénée; Le Docteur Rose, idem, 3 acts, Bouffes-Parisiens; Le Vengeur, opéra-bouffe, Legoux, Variétés; Les 400 Femmes d'Ali Baba, Nibelle, Folies-Marigny; Les Brioches du duc, Demarquette, Folies-Bergères; Le Passant, one-act, Paladilhe, Opéra-Comique; Sylvana, de Weber, 4 acts, Athénée; La Timballe d'Argent, 3 acts, Léon Vasseur, Bouffes-Parisiens; Djamileh, one-act, Georges Bizet, Opéra-Comique; Les Cent Vierges, Charles Lecoq, Variétés; La Princesse Jaune, one-act, Camille Saint-Saëns, Opéra-Comique; L'Alibi, 3 acts, Nibelle, Athénée; Dimanche et Lundi, one-act, Delandres, idem; Héloïse et Abtard, idem, Henry Litoff, Folies-Dramatiques; Don César de Bazan, opéra-comique, 3 acts, Massanet, Opéra-Comique; Mme. Turlupin, opéra-comique, 2 acts, Guiraud, Athénée.

BONN.—A grand festival is in preparation here in honor of Robert Schumann, the proceeds to be devoted to the erection of a monument to the illustrious composer. Mme. Clara Schumann, Herren Joachim and Brahms will take part as soloists.

A fresh laurel wreath was laid on Robert Schumann's tomb on the 6th inst. It was sent from the Dresden Singing Academy, which had celebrated the day previous the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation by the deceased composer.

The Dresdener Journal says it knows, on good authority, that some anonymous admirers of Schumann's music have subscribed thirty thousand thalers to found a Schumann Exhibition Fund, and have lodged the money in the hands of the composer's widow.

LEIPZIG.—The thirteenth Gewandhaus concert

(16th Jan.) was devoted to the performance of the following compositions:—Part 1. Overture to "Euryanthe" (Weber); aria, from "Cosi fan tutte" (Mozart), sung by Herr Nachbaur; Introduction a d Allegro appassionata for the pianoforte (Schumann), performed by Mme. Clara Schumann; cavatina, from "La dame blanche" (Boieldieu), sung by Herr Nachbaur; 1. Impromptu, in C moll, Op. 90 (Schubert); 2. Scherzo, from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Mendelssohn); morceaux pour piano, performed by Mme. Schumann (J. O. Grimm). Part II. Symphony (J. O. Grimm), new work conducted by the composer himself.

The programme of the fourteenth Gewandhaus concert (23rd Jan.) included the following items:—Part 1. Selections from the unfinished symphony in H moll (Schubert); Holderlin's "Schicksalslied," arranged for orchestra and chorus (Brahms), first time; Concerto Allegro for the violin (Bazzini), performed by Herr Sahla, from Erax; Hauch's "Winter and Spring," arranged for orchestra and chorus (Hartmann), first time; Schumann's arrangement of Geibel's "Gipsy Life," for orchestra and chorus, instrumented by Gradener. Part II. Symphony (No. 1, C dur) Schumann.

VIENNA.—After being allowed to slumber for almost, if not quite, as long a period as the Sleeping Beauty in the Wood, Gluck's Armida has been revived at the Imperial Operahouse, and restored to its place among the stock-pieces of that establishment. It is just a century since it was composed, and since it triumphed at Paris over Duni, Philidor, and Monsigny, over Rameau and Lulli, besides effectually putting an extinguisher on the previously popular Piccini. Every one engaged on the present occasion strove to do his or her best towards making the revival a success. First comes Mme. Dustmann, who sustained the part of the heroine in a manner fully justifying the loud and frequent applause bestowed upon her. Mr. Adams was zealous and correct as Rinaldo. The characters of Ubald, Hidroat, and Artemidor, found efficient representatives in Herren Bignio, Kraus, and Müller, respectively; Mme. Materna was the Fury of Hate, and Mlle. Siegstadt, the demon of the same objectionable passion. The chorus was efficient; so was the orchestra; the costumes were rich and in good taste, and the new scenery reflects credit on Herr Brioschi.

MUNICH.—Third Soirée for Chamber Music, given by Herren J. Venzl, Ch. Lehner, C. Hieber, and J. Werner, took place in the large hall of the Museum. The programme contained Quartet in E flat major, Cherubini; three Scotch Songs, with piano, violin, and violoncello, Beethoven; "Concerto Grosso" for two violins, and violoncello, two oboes, two violins (ripieno), tenor, double-bass, and piano, G. F. Handel; two Songs with Harp, Fr. Lachner, and F. Mendelssohn; Quartet in E, Op. 47, for piano, violin, tenor, and violoncello, R. Schumann.—The fourth and last Subscription Concert was devoted to Handel's oratorio of Judas Maccabæus. The solos were entrusted to Mme. Dietz, Mlle. Meysenheim, Herren Fischer and Vogl. The delight exhibited by the audience in this great work proved that, despite the—we mean, despite Herr Wagner—and all his works, a love for really classical music still exists in the Bavarian capital.

BOSTON, MARCH 8, 1873.

Harvard Symphony Concert.

The Seventh Concert, (Thursday, Feb. 27), attracted the largest audience of the season, and the general voice pronounces it about as good a concert, both in matter and performance, as the Harvard Musical Association has ever given. There was not a dull moment in it, nor aught that bordered on the commonplace or the extravagant; witness the bill of fare:

Overture: "The Hebrides," or "Fingal's Cave," op. 26, Mendelssohn.
Aria, [Contralto], "Son confusa pastorella," from "Porro," [with orchestral accompaniment for the first time] Handel.
Mrs. Flora E. Barry.

Serenade and Allegro Gioioso, for Piano-forte, with Orchestra, op. 43..... Mendelssohn.
Hugo Leonhard.

*Overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro"..... Mozart.
Krakowiak: Grand Rondeau de Concert, Op. 14, for Pianoforte with Orchestra..... Chopin.
Hugo Leonhard.

Songs:

a. *Ave Maria, (with Quartet accompaniment). Franz.
b. "The Soldier's Bride," op. 64, No. 1. Schumann.
c. Goethe's "May Song," op. 33, No. 6..... Franz.
Mrs. Flora E. Barry.
Symphony, No. 4, in D minor, op. 120..... Schumann.
Introduction and Allegro.—Romanza.—Scherzo.—Finale.

The most novel, as well as the most piquant and brilliant feature was the "Krakowiak" by Chopin, which appeared shortly after his first Concerto, (1834 or 35), a work of immense difficulty for the pianist, most fascinating in its unique and inexhaustible vivacity. A fine Polish fire pervades it, and the main theme, original with Chopin, is quite in the spirit of some old national dance melody. Upon the first appearance of the work a German critic wrote of it as follows:

"The introduction is formed by a simple popular melody, peculiar in its rhythm and its harmony, of the neighborhood of the free city of Cracow, which we do not know in its original form. Nor are we able to determine what share the composer has, if any, in the harmonic, strikingly effective, although always artless concatenation of the rhythmical periods; enough to say, that its effect is as telling as it is singularly charming. This 3-4 Andantino quasi Allegretto is followed by a short transitional Allegro molto in the same measure, in lively bravura for the principal instrument, to which succeeds the Rondo [Allegro non troppo, 2-4, F major], which also seems built upon a still more joyous country melody, whence its name. This leading subject keeps continually returning, or rather strikes through everywhere with a resistless vivacity, still more and more exciting; now we have the whole of it, now only a part, now freshly ringing with a piquant turn, and then so full of most surprising and peculiar figures, only interrupted by brief tutti passages, that one masterly effort of bravura is followed ever by another still more arduous and more striking. Not for a moment is there the slightest flagging of the entertainment, which is evermore renewed and varied, nay continually heightened, and which forms a true and tasteful whole, combining wonder with delight, if it be executed as it must be. But verily that is not easy. It is a very different sort of piece, for instance, from this master's Concerto; yet as it regards difficulty of rendering it stands quite upon the same level. It requires a thoroughly accomplished bravura player, in order to succeed. It is not enough that it be dashed off according to the notes and measure; but in the midst of the greatest difficulty it must be played with perfect ease, and with appropriate coloring and keeping; that is, it must be given with taste. In that case it will please even a mixed assembly, and will be a very grateful task for the performer; more grateful than many other things by the same composer, because here the difficulty strikes even uninformed listeners as being just precisely what it is. Accordingly it will not fail by its effect even when played without accompaniment; although the instrumentation gives it still greater freshness and, above all, greater distinctness. The wind instruments, especially, make the foundation melody, and the allusions to it, brighter and more rhythmically marked; while the strings, holding out their notes to every solo, preserve the full flow of the harmony."

That Mr. LEONHARD, in his most genial and effective presentation, for the first time in Boston, of this most difficult and yet delightful composition, proved himself fully equal to the requirements above mentioned, all who heard it will agree. It was a clear, precise, poetic rendering, full of delicacy and full of verve; the mood of the composer took possession of the audience, and the performer was unanimously recalled. If his triumph was not so exceptional in the Mendelssohn Allegro, the reason lay for the most part in the nature of the composition itself, the brilliancy and gladness of whose theme is sometimes slightly clouded by the harmony. It was, however, a thoroughly artistic performance and gave real pleasure. On the whole, the pianist seemed to surpass himself in that day's work, so conscientiously prepared, so happily inspired. And the accompanying instruments had also caught the spirit of it.

The vocal selections were as choice as possible, and sure to interest, and Mrs. BARRY never charmed more by her chaste, refined and sympathetic renderings. The Aria from one of Handel's Italian operas she has sung twice before in these Concerts, with pianoforte alone; but an orchestral accompaniment, completed by a loyal hand from the mere sketch in Handel's score, was needed to make manifest the real beauty of the piece; and this good work, for this occasion, had been expressly done for us by Robert Franz. The fresh, naive, peculiar charm of the melody, free from the mere Handelian commonplaces, was faithfully and sweetly conveyed by the singer, and set in fine relief by the full instrumentation, which, however, might have been a little more subdued in the performance.—The Ave Maria by Franz, the organ-like harmony of which had been transcribed from the pianoforte to a quartet accompaniment of muted strings by Mr. DRESSEL, was simply heavenly. A more soulful, pure, religious melody does not exist, and this time it had fit voice and accompaniment; all that there was left to be desired was something more of weight and power in Mrs. Barry's tones. The little ballad song by Schumann, "Die Soldatenbraut," heard for the first time, was very taking, and doubtless will have currency henceforth. And Goethe's playful little May Song: "Wo geh's Liebchen?" with a melody as witching, was sung better than ever this time, and does not begin to lose its freshness. The little songs were exquisitely accompanied on the piano by Mr. Dresel.

The orchestra had matter challenging its best powers, and really responded to the challenge with a zeal and loyalty which it has never yet surpassed. The dreamy, seashore poesy, as well as vivid sensuous beauty of the "Hebrides" Overture, has seldom seized and held attention so completely; many knew the work that day as they had never known it; and who will undertake to name a work of Mendelssohn's upon the whole more perfect? The little Mozart Overture to the "Marriage of Figaro" was most enlivening. It was only too soon over. Though taken at a lightning tempo (Mozart, at his rehearsals, never could get it done fast enough to satisfy him), it came out perfectly clear in outline and deliciously rich in color, the fine nervous accent of the violin parts keeping every sense awake and happy. It was refreshing to hear such an overture for once outside of the theatre, where such things are poorly done and where the unmusical opera public neither listens nor lets anybody hear. Played by a fit orchestra the unpretending little gem of a piece had actually the charm of novelty, and will be welcome when it comes in the same way again.

But all this was only prelude to the magnificent Schumann Symphony, in the rendering of which, throughout the four closely connected movements of the one indivisible and vital whole, Conductor and orchestra covered themselves with honor. Mr. ZERRAEN is at his best in just such tasks, creations that require unanimous enthusiasm and unflagging energy. The spirit, the broad plan, and the unswerving progress of the work, with tender justice to all its lovely episodes, was all brought out in a way that held all listening, wondering, delighted to the end. It is a great Symphony, one of the greatest, and yet it seemed so short! It is six years since it last figured in the Harvard programmes, and turning back to the record of our own impression then, we find it so true to the present experience, that we think we shall be more safe in reproducing that, than in attempting any new description:

The Symphony in D minor was principally written in 1841, immediately after the first in B flat; but was worked over anew in 1851 and published as No. 4, Op. 120. It was first produced at the Dusseldorf festival in 1853. The more we hear it the more we are inclined to think it the best of all the four. Schumann had by this time become master of the polyphonic form, and this work especially has that thorough unity and integrity as a whole which we admire in the great models before him. Nothing can be more unjust than to charge him, in these Symphonies, the Concerto in A minor, &c., with throwing away the traditions of the Symphonic form. Here there is not only a leading motive worked into the texture of each part, like organic fibre; but the motives of one movement reappear in another, knitting it all logically and poetically together. Thus the little phrase out of which the first Allegro is wrought is born already in the midst of the thoughtful, sombre Introduction, where after an opening crash in unison of all the orchestra, the middle instruments, reeds, &c., flow in sixths [3-4 time] with pleading accent. Then comes the Romanza in A minor, a quaint and lovely melody, so serious and earnest, sung by violoncello [how beautifully Fries played it!] and oboe in octaves, which calls up very naturally a reminiscence of the slow Introduction; and this musing on in undercurrent, while a new subject, a delicious, cool, fresh passage in triplets [sixteenths] sets in from the first violins. That Romanza is an exquisite poem and justifies its title.

The Scherzo, which follows in the original key, in sharp, wilful, almost surly accents, reminds one of now and then a strong Minuetto of that sort in Mozart, and has like emphatic unity and conciseness; its stern mood melts into a fascinating Trio in B flat, the first violins first leaning on a syncopated note and then gliding off in a smooth, liquid passage, made of phrases of six notes. This gradually dies out, weaker and weaker, murmurs itself in fragments, goes to sleep; the tempo is held back, while reeds and lower strings heave a few tranquil sighs, and suddenly, pianissimo, with tremolo accompaniment, in doubly slow time, that leading phrase of the first Allegro steals back in the violins, and mysteriously the whole orchestra awakes and swells to a sublime climax, holding out on a full dominant seventh chord, which fills the mind with expectation. This sea-breeze before dawn, as it were, is the transition to the Finale; it harbingers the return, with renewed strength and startling martial accompaniment, of that same dear phrase of the first Allegro. The new and bolder theme however prevails; relieved by episodes, one of which is like a sweet gush of tenderness out of the heart [Adagio] of the Choral Symphony. The bit of martial fugue into which it determines itself towards the end, the loud and stern brass passages, and finally the rushing Presto are grandly exciting. Indeed the whole movement teems with glorious ideas, as when the mind in a creative mood gets thoroughly wrought up and summons all its swift faculties about it; so that the Finale is the logical, clear climax and conclusion to a noble and sincere Art product. Much might be said of the fine instrumentation, the clear individualization of parts in the harmonic web, and so on; but without any such analysis of detail, the ideal, earnest, noble character of the whole Symphony was sure to impress itself on such audience in such a performance.

The Eighth Concert, for next Thursday afternoon, March 13, offers the following programme: PART I. Overture to "Manfred," Schumann; Bass Aria: "Give me back my dearest Master," from Back's Passion Music (M. W. WHITNEY); short Entr' acte from "Manfred"; Overture to "Jessonda," Spohr.—PART II. Aria and Gavotte from Back's Orchestral Suite in D; Concert Aria: "Alcandro, lo confesso," Mozart, (M. W. WHITNEY); Eighth Symphony (in F), Beethoven.

Chamber Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The programme of the second concert, Saturday evening, Feb. 22, was as follows:

Quartet in D minor, Op. 77..... J. Raff.
Moderato.—Vivace.—Andante.—Allegro.
Songs.—"Prayer"..... F. Hiller.
"Thine is my heart"..... Franz Schubert.
Quartet Satz, in C minor, posthumous fragment.
Franz Schubert.
Hungarian Dances, composed by Brahms, arranged for Violin..... Joachim.
Quartet in C, op. 59, No. 3, (Razoumofsky Set).
Beethoven.

The Quartet by Raff, by its strange opening harmonies, made us feel that we were entering a doubtful and a dismal element; and although later portions of the work were bright and animated, we could not shake off the ungenial chill of the ingenious music which so failed to warm us. We do not think we were alone by any means in that experience. The movement, not long since discovered, of an unfinished Quartet by Schubert, was at least music, unmistakable, with the Schubert fire in it, though not so interesting as his better known productions of the kind; refreshing after Raff. The Hungarian Dances, composed by Brahms for the piano, four hands, are very fresh and characteristic things, and, as transcribed for the violin by Joachim, and performed by Mr. WILLIAM SCHULTZ, made a lively and agreeable impression. The good old "Rasoumoffsky" Quartet was a solid comfort to go home on, and it was happy in the rendering. The violin of Mr. HAMM and the violoncello of Mr. HENNIG add real life and strength to these performances.

The singer was Miss ALICE FAIRMAN, who sang the "Prayer" by Hiller in a large and noble style, and produced such a sensation with the Schubert song, that she was obliged to repeat it.

For the third concert (last Saturday evening) these were the attractions:

Trio, No. 3, Op. 110, for Piano, Violin and Cello.
Robert Schumann.
Allegro non troppo.—Moderato.—Presto.—Con fuoco.
(A r from Don Giovanni: "Dalla sua pace".) Mozart.
Recitative and Siciliano, from "L'Allegro" Handel.
Sonata for Piano, in E flat, Op. 75. Dussek.
Allegro non troppo.—Andante Moderato.—Allegro moderato grazioso.
Quintet in F, Op. 60. Rubinstein.
Lento and Allegro non troppo.—Allegro.—Andante assai.—Allegro non troppo.

The Schumann Trio is one which we had never heard before. Though somewhat mystifying in some parts, it proved only less interesting than the two Trios which are better known. The Allegro seems almost wholly woven out of a little phrase or motive similar to that in the "Bird as Prophet" in one of his little Waldscenen. The Finale is indeed full of fire, bold and broad in themes and treatment. The rendering, by Messrs. B. J. LANG, SCHULTZ and HENNIG, was all that could be wished, and we must thank them for the first acquaintance with one of Schumann's larger works.—The Rubinstein Quintet, spiritedly led by Mr. HAMM (Mr. SCHULTZ generously sharing the first honors with him), impressed us with a sense of power, if not entirely of beauty. We were glad of an opportunity to hear for once something of Dussek's music,—a composer famous in his day, and still played frequently in London, by Mme. Arabella Goddard especially, but hitherto neglected here as being out of date and wholly superseded by the piano works of greater men like Beethoven. Dussek's Sonatas, classical in form and elegant in style, belonging to the same group with those of Cramer and Clementi, are models in their way, which to be sure is not a great one; they are fluent, graceful, ornate, with an air of fine society about them, but not profoundly stirring or imaginative. To perform them properly requires a finished artist, of great technical facility and taste, and in this instance Mr. Lang, as might have been expected, proved himself abundantly equal to the requirement. It could not be a very exciting, but it was a very pleasing and refined piece of reading. With all the elegance of these old writers, one must say, however, that a sense of sameness and of tameness overtakes him before the end of the Sonata, ever so well interpreted.

The singing, by Mr. CHARLES R. HAYDEN, was an interesting feature of the entertainment. He is a young man, a native of this State, of modest, intellectual appearance and sensitively musical temperament, who has studied both in Leipzig and in Italy. His voice is a delicate, pure tenor, of fair power, and he sings with real taste and feeling. Both of his selections, too, were excellent, and here as good as new. The matter of this whole concert, it will be observed, was new or nearly new to Boston.

This evening the Club give their fourth and last concert, with this programme:

Sextet in G, Op. 36, for two Violins, two Violas and two Cellos. Brahms.
Sonata for Piano and Cello, in D, Op. 58. Mendelssohn.
Messrs. Sumner and Hennig.
Solos for Violin: "Barcarole" Spohr.
"Air" and "Gavotte" from Suite. Vieuxtemps.
Charles Hamm.
Suite in Canon form, Op. 10, for two Violins, Viola, Cello and Bass. J. O. Grimm.

Chamber Concerts come in swarms just now. We have yet to speak of the first of Mr. LANG's series, Thursday of this week (the second comes March 20); two or more Piano Recitals by Mr. PETERSILEA; the third Matinée of Messrs. LEONHARD and EICHBERG (yesterday); and of the last N. E. Conservatory Recitals, in one of which Mr. J. A. HILLS, with the "Beethoven Quintette Club" (C. N. ALLEN, leader), played Schubert's "Forellen" Quintet, for the first time, we think, in Boston.—Miss ANNA MULLIG, we are happy to state, will give three Matinées at Mechanics' Hall on the 19th, 22nd and 26th of this March.

THE KREISSMANN TESTIMONIAL. It is known to many, but perhaps not all our music lovers, that the sterling artist and most generous and estimable man, Mr. AUGUST KREISSMANN, who has done so much for good music in this city and vicinity, has been for the past two years and more, and still is, prostrated, with only occasional brief respites, by one of those painful infirmities which it requires more than all one's natural strength merely to endure. Thus arrested in the midst of his activity, he has so far looked forward in vain to the resuming of his useful occupations. For many years the Conductor of the Orpheus Musical Society, one of our best vocal teachers, imbued more fully than perhaps any of our public singers with the spirit of the best German song, to whose interpretations we owe so much of our acquaintance with the songs of Franz, as well as of Schubert and Schumann, and we may add the Arias of Bach,—he has placed this public under obligations to him. By the subjoined correspondence it will be seen that the "Orpheus" propose to give a Complimentary Concert to their old leader, on the evening of March 29. In this testimonial they are joined by a large and influential committee of our musical citizens and friends of Mr. Kreissmann.

The concert, artistically, will be such an one as he, with his fine taste, would certainly approve. Mr. Zerrahn and the Orchestra of the Symphony Concerts have cordially volunteered their services; the "Orpheus" will sing some of their best selections; and our four pianists, who have been more or less associated with Mr. K. in times past, Messrs. DRESEL, PARKER, LANG and LEONHARD, will contribute something good. Other features of the programme will be duly announced. Meanwhile tickets, at $1.00, may be had at the Music Hall, or of any member of the Committee. There are no reserved seats.

Boston, Feb. 14, 1873.

August Kreissmann, Esq.: Dear Sir—The members of the Orpheus Musical Society, grateful for your long and efficient labors during the many years you have been their musical leader and director, are desirous to tender to you a Testimonial Concert, to take place at the Music Hall on the 29th of March, as a token of their gratitude and esteem.

In this they are joined by a number of your personal friends, whose names are subjoined, and who appreciate your efforts for the promotion of music in Boston.

Hoping that our offer will meet with your approval, I remain, Your obt. serv't.

LOUIS WEISSMANN,
President Orpheus Musical Society.

Boston, Feb. 17, 1873.

Louis Weissmann, Esq., President Orpheus Musical Society: Dear Sir—Yours of February 14 containing the agreeable announcement of the Orpheus Musical Society to tender me a complimentary concert, was duly received, and I take this, my first opportunity, of accepting your kind offer, to assure you of the pleasure and thankfulness with which it was received by me.

During my stay in Boston as a singer and public teacher, and throughout my long connection with your society as their musical leader and director, I have always endeavored to perform my duties to the extent of my ability, and especially have I aimed to create a taste, as well as appreciation, among the public for the highest and noblest in art and music.

It now gives me sincere gratification to know that these efforts of mine have not been forgotten, and are thus esteemed by your society and so many of my friends.

Their kind offer will enable me to bear my hard sickness with more ease, and to look forward with stronger hope to the time when I shall have so far recovered as to be able to meet them again in the rooms of their society.

Again thanking you for your friendly offer, which is most highly appreciated by me, I remain,
Yours truly,
AUGUST KREISSMANN.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, FEB. 17.—The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, in praiseworthy encouragement of American art, have brought out a new Symphony by Mr. GEO. F. BRISTOW, a composer whose name is already familiar to us all through his beautiful Cantata "Daniel" and his opera "Rip Van Winkle," and whose face is always to be seen among the first violins at our Philharmonic Concerts.

The Symphony, which was played at the third concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, on Saturday evening, Feb. 8, is called the "Arcadian," and is dedicated to the club bearing that name in our city.

It is to be regretted at the outset, that Mr. Bristow has placed, or endeavored to place, his composition under the head of "programme music," in which each part illustrates, or is supposed to illustrate, not the progress and development of an idea, but certain events or material objects which it is not within the province of music to describe. Any composer, therefore, who writes "programme music," either does not rightly comprehend his art, or is setting a trap to catch the applause of unreasoning and unmusical people. Mr. Bristow, not content, after the announcement that his Symphony is descriptive of "the passage of emigrants across the plains, and their arrival at the new Arcadia"—to leave the rest to the imagination of his hearers, has subdivided his description, as follows:

1. Allegro appassionato. The Emigrants journey across the plains.
2. Andante Religioso. Halt on the Prairie.—Evening Prayer.—Tallis's Evening Hymn.
3. Allegro ma non troppo. Indian War Dance.—Attack by Indians.
4. Allegro con Spirito. The arrival at the new home.—Rustic festivities and dancing.

Furthermore, each part being duly ticketed, it is thought necessary to amplify the labels after the following manner. (I quote from the programme verbatim):

Part 3. "The scene now changes to an Indian encampment, where the savages are engaged in a war-dance, preliminary to an attack. The third movement depicts the commotion among the Indians, who at the conclusion of the dance fall upon the encampment of the Emigrants, and, after a violent conflict, are repulsed. [The subject of this movement was suggested to the composer by General Franz Sigel.] The attack terminating in favor of the Emigrants, they proceed happily to their destination."

What there is in the music to indicate that the attack terminates in favor of the Emigrants instead of the Indians, I cannot perceive.

The Symphony might as well have been called "The Expedition to Santo Domingo," or "Stanley in search of Livingstone." [Subdivided: Part 1st. The notes of warning.—James Gordon Bennett in bed.—Departure of Stanley.—Thoughts of home. Part 2nd. Encampment in the African Desert.—Evening Hymn, &c., &c.]

Eliminating this very objectionable feature from the programme, I can speak of the Arcadian Symphony in terms of almost unqualified praise. The themes, except the Andante, are fresh and original; the interest for the most part well sustained, and the instrumentation throughout masterly.

The first movement (in E minor) opens with a beautiful theme which is given out by the viola, and which alternates with a second motive for the violins. The other instruments gradually take up the first motive until it is sounded by the full orchestra. A beautiful and intricate passage for the strings ensues, followed by a long succession of skilfully instrumented passages for strings, reeds and horns, which, at length, results in a sort of anti-climax and becomes tiresome. It is the general opinion of critics here that the extreme length of this movement detracts from its artistic effect.

The second movement (B major) introduces Tallis's Evening Hymn; and the orchestration here, also, is admirable.

This is followed by an "Allegro ma non troppo," in A minor, introducing a sort of Packeltanz, wild as a witches' revel on Walpurgis night. This is set off against a brief interpolation in D major, which renders the barbaric rhythm of the dance still more striking.

The finale in E is a bright sparkling Allegro, full of charming fancies, which, gradually increasing to a Presto leads to a sort of dance-measure, and forms a graceful conclusion to a work which will rank among the best that have been produced in America.

The other pieces upon the programme were as follows:

- Andante from Trio, op. 96.....Beethoven.
String Orchestra.
Overture to "Robespierre".....Litolff.
Concerto for Violin, (1st movement).....Beethoven.
Variations in D minor.....Corelli.
Mme. Camilla Urso.
Recit and Aria: "Mura Felice".....Rossini.
Die Waldhexe (The Forest Witch).....Rubinstein.
Miss Antoinette Sterling.

In the Andante from the great B-flat Trio, the harp made a poor substitute for the piano, which is placed so boldly in the work as Beethoven wrote it: nevertheless it is a great pleasure to hear that lovely Cantabile, even when thus changed.

Mme. Urso was admirable, as usual, and Miss Sterling sang with her customary earnestness and correctness.

The Brooklyn Philharmonic concerts are always well attended,—as they certainly deserve to; be and in producing a new and original work like the Arcadian Symphony, the society proved its own enterprise and paid a fitting tribute to an excellent composer.

On Saturday evening, Feb. 15, at the fourth concert of the N. Y. Philharmonic Society, the programme opened with a Symphony in B minor, by Gade, a work which made a very favorable impression. It is divided as follows:

1. Allegro molto e con fuoco (B minor).
2. Allegro moderato (B minor).
3. Andante (E maj).
4. Finale. Allegro non troppo [B min].

This was followed by an Aria from "The Creation," rather poorly sung by Herr Carl Spengler. An Adagio for the Violoncello by Bargiel came next, and this was exquisitely rendered by Mr. F. Bergner, who is one of the best violoncellists I have ever heard. Then came Mr. Matzka's Overture "Galileo," a new work meriting an extended notice which I have not time to give. A translation by Mme. Ritter printed in the programme gave a key to the music.

"The earth stands still!"—a dungeon's torture-trial
Wrung from the lips, that ne'er before dissembled,
Of Galilei, new-found truth's denial;
Though great their victory, his opponents trembled,
For, scarce unloosed the ignoble bonds that bound him,
Upsprings he, scattering the pale slaves around him,
With gesture, glance, his pain-wrung lie disproves,
And cries, in truth's own voice,
'And yet it moves!'"

Beethoven's Symphony in C minor occupied the second part of the programme. The orchestra, throughout the concert, played badly; worse than ever before, it seemed to me.

At a concert given by the Onslow Quintette, at De Garmo Hall, on Wednesday evening, Feb. 5, the principal selections were Schumann's Quartet in A minor (op. 41, No. 1), a Trio in F (op. 6) by A. Bargiel, and No. 7 of the "Seven Words" by Haydn [1st and 2nd violin, viola and violoncello.] Besides this there were part-songs by Sullivan and Agnes Zimmermann, and a Vocal Quartet, "The Ring," by F. Brandels, sung by Misses Brainerd and Bulkeley and Messrs. Bush and Schaffner. The last named piece was encored in a manner very complimentary to the composer. A. A. C.

PHILADELPHIA, FEB. 20.—Last Saturday Mr. WOLFSOHN gave the last of his delightful series of matinees. Raff's "Forest" Symphony, by universal request, was repeated. The interpretation was very satisfactory. Mr. Wolfsohn honored us with a performance on the piano of Taubert's "Invitation a la Danse" (Weber), and a "Slumber Song" of his own. Cumbersome as the former is it was agreeably given, and the latter was delightful. Mr. Wolfsohn proposes to give a series of Saturday Evening Orchestral concerts at the Academy, when in addition to his orchestra we shall hear several prominent vocal and instrumental soloists.

In the evening at Musical Fund Hall a tremendous audience assembled to hear the "Orpheus Club's" second concert. This, as you are aware, is a male singing society, and one of the three which should render Philadelphia famous for male choral singing. When a society has reached so high a point, and in so short a time, it challenges close criticism. To begin with the selections, there was not novelty enough. Of ten choruses, only two were new to the audience, and three others had been sung by this very club at their first concert this season. The pieces were: "Sabbath Day," Kreutzer; "Voyage," Mendelssohn; "Soldier's Life," Kuecken; "Snow Drop," Barnby; "Strike the Lyre," Cooke; "Beauties, have you seen a toy," Evans; "The Letter" and "April Showers," Hatton; "Good Night" by Abt, and Spofforth's "Hail smiling morn." All the pianissimo passages were excellent, but the forte portions suffered for want of second bass. This is certainly the weak point of the Club; although eight individuals sing on this part, it is always weak, indeed sometimes inaudible. The first tenors are very fine, but on this occasion one of the number suffered his voice to break unpleasantly once or twice, which somewhat marred the effect. On the whole the concert was not nearly so great a success as the first one, which probably had made them over-confident. This was the occasion of the public entree of Mr. Edward Giles, a gentleman who has been studying in Europe for a year or so, and from whom great things were looked for. His selections were "Weiss's 'Village Blacksmith,'" Sullivan's "A life that lives for you," and Mariani's "Contrabandiere." Whether from a cold or fright, his register in which he prides himself was sadly limited, the upper E being quite out of his usual reach, while his low notes were ridiculously feeble. What we heard of his voice, however, we were pleased with, and he sings with great taste, but he wants power. His voice is a smooth basso, but of limited range. He received an encore for the Italian song, and responded with another which he sang with great taste and expression.

That same evening Mr. JARVIS gave his fourth soiree at Chickering Hall. I append the programme:

- Sonata—Piano, Op. 49, D minor, No. 3.....Weber.
Charles H. Jarvis.
Violin Solo—"Andante and Rondo Russe". De Beriot.
G. Gulemann.
Piano Solos—
Barcarolle, Op. 60, F sharp. (First time)....Chopin.
Noveletten, Op. 21, Heft. 1, No. 2, D major.
(First time).....Schumann.
Fantasie-Stuecke—Piano and Clarinet, Op. 73. "
Messrs. Jarvis and Plagemann.
Trio—Piano, Violin and 'Cello, G major, Op. 1,
No. 2.....Beethoven.
Messrs. Jarvis, Gulemann and Popper.

On Tuesday, Feb. 18, Mr. GAERTNER gave his second concert at the Amateurs' Drawing Room. This was the programme:

- Quintet in G minor.....Mozart.
Poco Adagio, 2 violins, viola and 'cello.....Haydn.
Canzonetta.....Mendelssohn.
Andante from Quintet.....Beethoven.
Nonetto.....Spohr.

A fine selection, and deserving of a larger audience. The opening piece was played with firmness and with great expression. The Spohr Nonetto was exceedingly well done. The artists showed more unity of action than we are accustomed to find in our concerted performances. The "Austrian Hymn" Quartet should not be left out of this brief account of one of the most delightful performances it has ever been my fortune to hear.

FEB. 26.—On Saturday evening Musical Fund Hall was again compactly filled; this time to hear the second concert of the "Abt Male Singing Society." Coming one week after the "Orpheus Club" it suggested comparisons. The "Abt's" selections were more thoroughly musical and far more difficult than those of the "Orpheus." The programme was rich in good things, and was far better rendered than that of the first concerts of the season. Mendelssohn's "Love and Wine" is superb, and such a noble rendering did it receive that it was heartily encored. Hatton's "Life Boat," a spirited, melodious piece, was redemanded. Gade's "Gondola Song" was a perfect specimen of pianissimo singing; and again in "The Hour's Prayer" and "The Tranquil Lake," both by Mueller, the Society showed their wonderful ability in delicate and subdued passages. But by far the most magnificent male part-singing I ever heard was in Moehring's "Battle Prayer." The piece itself is wonderfully rich in its harmony; the clear, fresh voices of the first Tenors contrasted finely with the superb richness of the low Basses, and there was great exactness and unity of enunciation on the part of all. It was enthusiastically encored. The "Hostess's Daughter," by Smart, and Kuecken's "Loyal Song," both repeated from the last concert, together with Mendelssohn's "Wanderer's Song," and Bishop's "Mynherr Van Dunc," completed the chorus part of the programme. Abt's "Ave Maria," as a quintet, and Hatton's "Good Night," as a quartet, were also sung and both were encored. The only drawbacks to the Abt's concerts are: first, hearing the same old voices in every quartet or quintet that is sung at every concert; and secondly a tendency to fall from the pitch. This latter is owing probably to the fact that the second Bass is too ponderous for the first Tenors, or that too little attention is paid to this fault at rehearsals. The "Orpheus" Club seldom if ever fall in pitch, but they are kept up by the continuous and sometimes too prominent singing of their Conductor all through their concerts! Great as this fault is, it is far more tolerable than to hear occasionally the harsh crash of the conductor's voice above those of the chorus. EUSTACE.

"When evening cometh downward On wings of shadowy gloom." Full of simple beauty.
Hark! 'Tis the Saviour's Voice. Trio for Alto, Tenor and Bass. 4. A♭ to a. Drema. 40
A well wrought "Hymn set to music," with considerable elaboration in the accompaniment.
The Confession. 3. D to e. Booth. 30
"But the answer that I made Father, I forget. Ora, ora pro me!"
"The Atlantic" speaks highly of it. It should be a success in a concert.
The Joyous Reapers. Duet. 2. B♭ to e. Campana. 35
"We are two merry, light-hearted reapers." A charming little duet, with a touch of Italian grace in it.
Philosophic Sam. Song and Cho. 2. C to f. Rosewig. 30
"Sam! Sam! Sam! Sam!" Comic. Much better than the average.
My one True Love. 3. G to e. Gabriel. 35
"Thou art mine forever!" Graceful love song.
Field-Marshal Spring. (Feldmarshall Frühling). Duet. 4. G to g. Abt.
"His trumpeters are larks so gay." A quaint German conceit set to music. Very pretty for schools.

A paraphrase for piano, and splendid, of course.
Fra Diavolo. Fantasie. 4 hands. S. Smith. 1.00
Brilliant arrangement of most pleasing airs.
Turkish March. With portrait. 5. B♭. Rubinstein. 40
Beethoven's Turkish March, arranged pretty much as he would arrange it for our modern pianos.
Credit Mobilier. Grand March. 4. C. Cramer. 40
Not intended as a "Rogue's March" at all, but powerful and brilliant.
Little Bird's Nest. Easy pieces by Mack. ca. 30
1. Little Party Waltz. 1. G.
2. Herald Galop. 2. G.
3. Drummer Boy's March. 2. G.
4. Little Rosebud Mazurka. 2. D.
5. Butterfly Redowa. 2. G.
The 20 pieces which will be found in the "Little Bird's Nest" are just the things for beginners.
Torchlight March. 4 hds. 5. E♭. Meyerbeer. 1.25
This is Fackeltanz, No. 3, and is more properly a Torch-Dance than a March. Very powerful, brilliant and spirited.
Children's Mazurka. 4 hds. 3. F. Lippitt. 40
A successful attempt to familiarize young players with the "mazurka" movement. Very pleasing.

Gossec.

[Translated from the French for Dwight's Journal of Music.]

III.

Along with this impulse given by Gossec to instrumental and sacred music, a great revolution was going on in dramatic music. The Opera had not been able to disengage itself from the swaddling-clothes with which Lully had bound it at its birth. The attempt made in 1750 to introduce Italian music had only provoked a fierce paper war, the result of which was the almost immediate dismissal of the unlucky Italian singers. J. J. Rousseau had produced his Devin du Village, the success of which seemed to predict that the reign of melody was about to commence. But this effort, however successful it may have been, was, so to speak, abortive, and found no imitators. The slow, psalm-like strains of Lully and his followers were quickly restored to public favor. Rameau, who for a moment had been nearly dethroned, regained his ascendancy, and his repertoire, for a short time banished by the appearance of the Italian buffonistes, had again almost undisputed possession of the bills of the royal Academy of Music. In the meantime the revolution vainly attempted at that theatre was going on in another place. Beside that public encrusted with prejudices, whose apathy and whose habits of routine it is impossible to overcome, is another, young and progressive, whose enthusiasm nothing can check, and whose taste and whose sympathies always triumph in the end. This public, attracted for the moment to the opera by the representation of La Serva Padrona and other master-pieces of the Italian school, soon forgot the way to that theatre when those works were no longer given. It took that to the Comédie-Italienne, where their translations were performed, and where Duni, Philidor and Monsigny had already attempted to prove that pleasing music could be made even to French words. Philidor's Bloise le savetier was given in 1759, Le Soldat Magicien in 1760, Le Maréchal ferrant in 1761. Monsigny had prepared the way for his master-pieces, Le Déserteur and Félix by works of less merit, but which showed what might be expected from his genius. These were: On ne s'avise jamais de tout, 1761; Le Roi et le Fermier, 1762, and Rose et Colas in 1764. It was in that year that Gossec made his first effort in the dramatic style and gave, at the Comédie-Italienne, Le Fauz Lord, the music of which caused its success. In 1767, his little opera of Les Pêcheurs met with such success that it occupied the stage nearly the whole of the remainder of the year. It was followed the next year by the Double Déguisement and Toinon et Toinette.

But in 1767 a very colossus of talent took possession of a stage which he was destined during a period of more than forty years to adorn and enrich. Grétry produced his Huron, and Gossec saw that with such a rival no contest could be possible. He resumed his place of composer of instrumental music, and the following year founded the celebrated amateur concert, the orchestra of which was conducted by the famous Chevalier de Saint-Georges. This orchestra, created by Gossec, was the first complete orchestra that France had ever possessed. In order to appreciate the innovations made in the composition of this orchestra, it will be proper to cast a retrospective glance at what had been for a century the assemblages of musicians figuring either in the theatres or in concerts.

Lully, in creating the Opera, had found in France no suitable elements for the proper foundation of this species of performance; he was obliged to make use of the very inconsiderable resources to be found among the professional musicians, scattered as they were with no centre of union and no acquaintance with concerted music. Later he trained up pupils and succeeded in bringing together an orchestra, whose arrangement seems singular enough to us, accustomed as we are to a wealth of instrumentation far removed from the simplicity of those primitive germs. The orchestra of Lully's opera was arranged in the following manner: the stringed instruments were divided into five parts, comprising first violins, first violas, violas, bass and double bass violas. Violoncellos were not introduced until later, and the modern double bass was not admitted into France until 1709, long after the death of Lully. It was played for the first time by one Montclair, a very clever composer, in Jephthé, an opera of his own composition. The effect of the instrument was found to be excellent, and Montclair was engaged at the Opera as contra-bassist. At first he was expected to play only once a week, on Saturday, the great day for the Opera, and that of the best performances. It was not long before the contra-bass was demanded every day; then a single one was not enough, one was added, afterwards two, then three, then four. At present there are eight in the orchestra at the Opera.

To return to Lully's orchestra, we must give a list of the wind instruments. These were numerous, but were divided quite differently from those of our day. First there were the flutes, not the German flute, the only one now in use, but the beaked flute (of which the flag-eolet remains to us), and of which the smallest inconvenience was its being almost constantly out of tune. The flutes formed one complete family; there were treble, tenor and bass flutes. It was the same with the oboes, the bass of which is the bassoon. For brass instruments, there were trumpets with stops and hunting horns; and for instruments of percussion they had kettle-drums and tambourines for dance music. They had also a harpsichord for accompanying the recitatives. But what they were entirely ignorant of, was the art of blending these different instruments together. When the composer desired a forte, he wrote the word tous (all), and then the copyist doubled the parts for the stringed instruments by parts for wind instruments of corresponding register. In certain passages, rarely except in ritornellos, the composer wrote flutes or oboes, and these instruments played alone, which was the easier for them as their system was complete. The bassoons played almost always with the bass and double-bass violas, which, mounted with many strings, had very little sonority. But the idea of taking advantage of the difference in the tone of their instruments, and of giving them particular parts for the purpose of blending them together, had not occurred to them. However, Lully's orchestra excited the admiration of his contemporaries, and one of his panegyrists lauds him for having introduced every known instrument, even, he adds, the tinker's whistle. I have looked over all of Lully's scores without finding any indication of these instruments, which are entirely unknown to me.

When Rameau gave his first opera, Hippolyte et Aricie (1733), instrumentation had made great progress; the German flute had replaced the beaked flute; the oboes had been perfected; they were played with finer reeds and had gained greatly in softness and sweetness. Rameau, who was fertile in invention, made great innovations in the arrangement of parts; he concerted wind with stringed instruments, and produced surprising effects by means of these combinations. The clarinet, invented in 1690, was not used in France until 1745, and then by Rameau in his opera Le Temple de la Gloire; but it made part of the orchestra only occasionally, and in the overture as a rare and curious instrument. The clarinet had not yet obtained the freedom of the orchestra. As late as 1780 the Comédie-Italienne possessed none. Grétry, however, had made use of it in Zémire et Asor, but only in the minor trio, and as an unusual instrument which must produce a magical effect. Besides, the clarinet, at the time it was introduced into France, was not the same instrument with sweet, melancholy tones which we now hear; on the contrary, it was harsh and piercing. The name it received proves this: Clarinetto is the diminutive of clarino, clarion, trumpet; in fact, the first composers who made use of it, employed it only to double the octave for the flourishes of horns and trumpets, and this use was continued even after the instrument was, as it were, transformed. Haydn and Mozart rarely fail to double their appels of horns and trumpets with the clarinet. The French horn appeared about this time, and caused the hunting-horn to be proscribed in the orchestra. Its virtuosos could practise upon it only in the dog-kennel and the ale-house.

After the preceding account we can imagine the effect produced by the performance of Gossec's 21st Symphony, in D, the score of which presents the union of two parts for tenor violins, violoncellos, double-basses, one flute, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets and kettle-drums. This is very nearly the arrangement adopted at present. Its effect was immense, and from that time the author continued to produce works composed upon that system, among others his symphony entitled La Chasse, which passed for the truest expression of the scene it was intended to describe, until Méhul's overture to Le Jeune Henri, for which in fact it had served as model, appeared and bore off the palm, which up to that time had been reserved for Gossec alone.

The directorship of the sacred concert becoming vacant in 1773, Gossec connected himself with Gaviniès and Leduc and obtained the position. In his hands it could not fail to prosper; to him it owed its great reputation, which he was continually increasing by new compositions. We may remark among others the Oratorio of the Nativity, in which was enthusiastically applauded a choir of angels, placed by the composer outside of the concert hall, and singing under the very dome of the edifice.

However, if Gossec, finding the rivalry of Grétry too dangerous, had relinquished the Comédie-Italienne, the Royal Academy of Music offered no similar peril. Since Rameau, a single composer had obtained a decided success at that theatre. This was Philidor with his Ernelinde; but he seemed to take up art only as a recreation. The one serious and important thing for him was chess, and it was only in the leisure moments left from his favorite game and in order to rest from the fatigue caused by the combinations of the chess-table, that he consented to occupy himself with his operas. The very genuine talent of Philidor thus offered no serious obstacles, and Gossec, after the merited success of his great opera, Sabinus, was almost sure of occupying the place alone; when a rival not less formidable than Grétry had been, appeared and seized the position which for a moment Gossec might have flattered himself that he had gained.

Sabinus, played in 1773, had been followed by Alexis et Daphné in 1775, and it was in the month of April, 1776, that the first performance of Iphigénie en Aulide took place. This was the first of that series of master-pieces with which Gluck was about to enrich France. Be it said to the praise of Gossec, that he was not only among the first to recognize the superiority of Gluck, but he was also one of the most ardent partisans of that great man, aiding him in the performance of his works with all his influence and all his experience of men and things. Gluck, who appreciated Gossec's merit and his talent, swore to him an eternal friendship, in which gratitude must have borne a large part. Gossec gave to the Opera one or two other works, but he continued to obtain his greatest successes in the direction of instrumental and religious music. An impromptu afforded him an especially remarkable triumph. Gossec's manners were charming; notwithstanding his great talents he counted only friends, and he was every where received with open arms. A certain M. de Lasalle, Secretary to the Opera, had a small country-house at Chenevières, a village situated near Sceaux.

Gossec went there often on Sundays; the greater part of the artists of the Opera met there, and a sort of family festival was held. One fine day in summer, the day of the village fête, Gossec, who had set out early from Paris, had just arrived with three singers from the Opera, Lays, Chéron and Rousseau. Entering the salon they found M. de Lasalle in conference with the Curé of the place; they were about to withdraw discreetly, when M. de Lasalle insisted that they should enter.

"Come in, my friends," said he, "I cannot do without you; perhaps you can help me relieve this poor Curé from his embarrassment. He does not know which way to turn."

"What is the matter?" said the new arrivals.

"It is this, gentlemen," said the poor Curé: "they promised me at Notre Dame to send me singers to perform a musical mass. For a whole month I have been announcing it at church and have had it cried through all the neighboring villages and châteaux, and we are going to have a splendid assembly. Well! Now see how unlucky I am. I have just received a letter saying that Monseigneur will not permit the cathedral singers to come here to sing. You see I am a ruined man; all the fine people whom I was expecting will turn back without even entering the church as soon as they hear that the musical mass is not to take place, and bad news flies so fast! I shall lose the magnificent collection I was counting on, and these opportunities come only once a year."

"Mon Dieu, yes," added M. de Lasalle, "the worthy Curé was just asking me if I could not send to Paris for some singers from the Opera; but since you are here all ready, cannot you gratify his wishes?"

"What!" said the Curé, "are these gentlemen from the Opéra?"

"Certainly," said M. de Lasalle, "I beg to present to you Messrs. Lays, Chéron and Rousseau, three of our celebrities."

"Oh! I know these gentlemen very well," said the Curé, "I have often heard them spoken of."

"Where?" asked Chéron.

"At confession," replied the Curé. "Gentlemen, do a kind act; edify to-day those who yesterday perhaps ran the risk of damnation for the sake of hearing you."

"I ask nothing better," said Lays. "I would sing willingly, but I know nothing by heart."

"Neither do I," said Chéron.

"Nor I," said Rousseau.

"Well!" says Lays, have not we what we want here at hand? Let Gossec compose something for us, and we three will sing it."

"Compose what?" said Gossec, in an hour, without accompaniments!"

"Ah! Monsieur Gossec," said the Curé, "you have written such great, such beautiful things! It cannot be difficult for you to perform a good action, and that is what I beg of you."

"Well, then," said Gossec, "give me a sheet of ruled paper, and leave me alone for a quarter of an hour."

"Bravo!" cried Lays, "and during that time we will take our breakfast, so as to recover our strength and put us in good voice. You, Curé, go and announce that nothing is to be changed except the names of the performers, and that instead of singers from Notre Dame, you are to have actors from the Opéra. If the devil gains any thing by it, your collection shall lose nothing."

The Curé withdrew delighted; our three friends breakfasted, Gossec wrote as if by inspiration his O Salutaris. The three singers rehearsed it, their mouths full, and a few minutes afterward sang it in the church of Chenevières, exciting the admiration of the entire audience. The anecdote became known and the singers had to perform the piece the next Sunday at the sacred concert. It had immense success, and this improvised O Salutaris remains a master-piece.

In 1784, Gossec conceived the plan of a school of song. There was at that time no organized system of public instruction in music, and he felt the need of a school in which might be trained the singers whom there was so much difficulty in obtaining for the theatre. The Baron de Breteuil not only shared his ideas, but furnished him the means for carrying them out. This school, which contained the germ of what afterward became the Conservatoire, would no doubt have attained a high degree of development, had not the painful events of 1789 interrupted every enterprise and forced the founders to abandon their design. Gossec had reached his fifty-sixth year when the revolution broke out. A man of less energy might have become discouraged at finding his career interrupted, his habits interfered with, those whom he was accustomed to see around him scattered. His mind was still as young and vigorous as if he had been thirty years younger; he had embraced with ardor the liberal principles of '89; they were, in fact, those of the great majority, it is only the excesses of that revolution which caused it to be hated by those who had hailed it with transport.

[Conclusion next time.]

The Sonata Form.

BY W. G. M'NAUGHT.

[A paper read before the Tonic Sol-fa College (London), January 2nd, 1873.]

A Sonata is generally understood to be a composition in several movements for one or two instruments. These movements, although usually quite separable, are always connected with one another at least by relation of key; and each is constructed on one of several plans, the peculiar plan of the first movement being almost invariable. This particular plan has come to be known as the "Sonata Form," and it is called a "First movement." Frequently a later movement is constructed on the Sonata Form. Trios, Quartets, Symphonies, &c., being really Sonatas for a number of performers, have precisely the same scheme; and most Overtures are also cast in the form of a First movement. It should be clearly understood that the term "First movement" does not exclusively refer to the initial movement of a piece, and that the expression "Sonata Form" does not exclusively refer to the form of a Sonata. Both terms are used indifferently to identify a certain construction which it is the object of this paper to explain.

Of all forms of abstract music the sonata form is the highest. Haydn was the first great musician to grasp it, if he did not invent it (the germs of the form can be traced in the works of earlier writers), and his innumerable quartets and symphonies are to this day considered models of perfection in clear form. Mozart and Beethoven, especially the latter in his grand sonatas and symphonies, enlarged but did not alter the plan. Nearly all the classical instrumental works are influenced by the sonata form. "It is so gratifying to the ear, and so satisfactory to the musical sense that it has never been abandoned by any composer who has once learnt to work in it" (Hullah). An effort to understand it will not be mispent even by those claiming little or no technical knowledge of harmony, whose natural taste may have led them to enjoy the performance of great instrumental works. Their enjoyment will be enhanced and intensified when the form which great musicians have created is grasped and habitually followed. Recently all form in music has been vigorously attacked by an influential school of musicians nicknamed apostles of the Music of the Future. However, it is not my present purpose to attempt its defence; I have simply to expound it.

The mode of development in a first movement is thematic. That is to say the whole of the movement may be traced to the suggestions of one or two comparatively short themes. These themes are as it were the bud containing in embryo the full blown rose. In this principle of thematic treatment it will be observed there is a resemblance to the construction of a fugue, of which more hereafter. A first movement is divided into two parts, the divisions being commonly noted by a double bar and the sign of repeat. In the absence of the double bar in cases where the composer does not care to have each half repeated, the divisions can always be distinguished by the course of modulation and the completion of the ideas or subjects. The general theoretical plan may be first introduced as follows:—First a subject is proposed in the principal key of the piece. A subject is not necessarily a well defined melody; it may be characterized by peculiar rhythm or striking harmony; it is usually however a musical idea that can be easily detached from and remembered without its surroundings. See Mozart's sonata in F (No. 1, Peter's), measures 1 to 9 and again measures 44 to 50 of Allegro; Beethoven's sonata in F minor, op. 2 (p. 3, Pauer's edition), measures 1 to 9 Allegro; also his sonata in E♭ Op. 31, measures 1 to 8 and 45 to 52 of Allegro. The term Subject will be afterwards found to have technically a wider meaning. After the first subject there occurs a passage, or it may be a series of passages, leading up to and very strongly suggesting a new key by resting on its dominant. It is not easy to define in words a "passage." A passage is generally florid, consisting of scale runs or of sequences; it is rarely conclusive, and has a tendency to lead to something. See Mozart in F, measures 38 to 42. Beethoven in F minor 34 to 42, and in E♭ 53 to 56. After the passage, if the key of the movement is major, a second subject is announced in the key of the dominant and after the second subject a second passage markedly terminating in the same key. So far no keys but those of the first and second subjects are more than glanced at; the purpose being to impress these two keys and subjects well on the mind. The two subjects and their succeeding passages complete the first part of the movement, and this is usually played twice. The earlier portion of the second part is taken up by the working of the previous matter, which is now inverted, extended, tortured, twisted, and sent roving into remote keys. That which was major is now minor, that which was loud is now soft, and the keys of the first part are almost as carefully avoided as formerly they were affirmed. It is exceptional to find any new matter in this portion of the movement. If any matter apparently fresh is introduced, it is usually soon fitted as a counterpoint to one of the subjects. This freedom of change of key, rhythm, and design, or as it is often called, free fantasia,* continues until the composer's fancy is exhausted and the first subject is sought for in the original key. Then follows a recapitulation of the whole matter of the first part with this difference, that instead of the passage after the first subject leading to the dominant of the new key, it is made to lead to the dominant of the original key, in which key the second subject now appears, and the movement concludes with its attendant passage, of course similarly transposed. Sometimes a composer prefers to end with a brilliant coda quite adventitious to the design. It is often made up of the preceding matter. The following formula will assist the memory—

First part	First subject and passages. Second or dominant subject and passages.
Second part	Free fantasia on previous matter. Recapitulation of first part, both subjects in one key. Coda.

* A fantasia is a composition in which no particular form is studied, the composer being free to exercise his fancy without restriction or set design. The great masters rarely expressed their thoughts through the medium of fantasias, but lesser geniuses for obvious reasons use it oftener.

Mr. Macfarren graphically likens a first movement to a lecture on chemistry in which the lecturer may expound the qualities of salts and of acids (so our first part with its first and second subjects); he will then exhibit these diverse elements in combination, and effervescence will be the result of the experiment (so the working of our second part); lest the spectators forget in their changed condition the primitive nature of his ingredients, he will then once more display them in their original simplicity; and perhaps, if he be generous, he may make one more brilliant experiment for his peroration (and thus, our recapitulation and possible coda.)

The formula given above is in practice somewhat more complicated. A so-called subject often includes several ideas answering to my first definition. The additional ideas are indifferently called episodes, tributaries, parentheses, or they are classed under the one title, Subject. Mr. Macfarren says "A Subject now-a-days, or so much of a movement as is classed under this wide description, often consists of several distinct ideas, always consequent indeed and growing out of what precedes, but quite separable in the memory and recognizable as several members of one entirety." For clearness' sake I shall use the term Subject only for the two leading themes, and shall distinguish the other matter as episodes or tributaries. These episodes are not imperative in the design, and their number and length are quite at the composer's discretion. In many of Beethoven's works these episodes assume great importance, and his elaborate treatment of them is a characteristic feature of his style. Rarely they are in a key remote from the principal key of the movement. Thus if a first subject is in key C and the second in key G, and connected with the latter an episode in the key of the mediant (B) is announced, a key remote from the original key is reached. Usually, however, this episodic or parenthetical matter clings to the keys of the subjects by which it is preceded. It has been stated that the key of the second subject is that of the dominant of the original. This is the case when the principal key is major. Very rarely the second subject is in the minor or major of the third, or the sixth, or the major key of the minor third or the minor sixth. In an examination at random of twenty-first movements in major keys nineteen had the second subject in the major key of the dominant, and one in the major key of the mediant—Beethoven's sonata, Op. 53, in C. In this single instance both the change of key and the second subject, if uncommon, are extremely beautiful. The first subject is in C, the passage modulates into E minor and the dominant seventh in that key is resolved on the major tonic instead of on the minor, and thus the change of key is almost insensibly effected. When the key or mode of the first subject is minor, the second subject is in the relative major or in the relative minor of the dominant, and sometimes it is in other related keys. In Mendelssohn's "Reformation Symphony" the first subject is in D minor, and the second subject hovers between A minor and A major. In Beethoven's A minor string quartet the second subject is in F major, the minor sixth of the first subject. But in the large majority of instances the second subject of a movement in a minor key is in either the relative major or in the minor of the dominant. The following is the more extended formula:—

First part.	Tonic group consisting of first subject, passages, tributaries, and episodes. Dominant group consisting of second subject, &c.
Second part.	Working or development of previous matter in other keys, sometimes called free fantasia. Recapitulation in principal key, and Coda.

A so-called Sonata not constructed regularly but still having some semblance of form is usually titled a "Sonata Quasi Fantasia," but it is not always the composer thus apologizes for its irregular form. In analyzing for the first time on the above plan it may happen that the student will find it difficult to distinguish the smaller divisions. It must be remembered that this continuous flow is one of the necessities of a first movement, and wanting it the cessation would be considered faulty. The subjects and passages are therefore purposely somewhat woven, and pompous closes are avoided except in the two places where the passage leads to the second subject, and the last passage or "peroration" closes the first part, with a well marked cadence.

But in both cases the close is on the dominant, and the ear confidently expects more.

Let me again remind you of the salient features of a first movement by venturing another analogy. It may be likened to a romance, the first subject being the hero, the second subject the heroine, the episodes the subordinate characters; or if an episode be very prominent, a jealous rival, or the customary villain. The first part is a simple description of the characters, and the first portion of the second part portrays the troubles, disappointments, and invariably general restlessness of the persecuted couple. The ultimate recapitulation of the two subjects in one key depicts the happy union of the couple now virtually one, and the coda, if it be wild and furious, I must leave to the imagination of the experienced what it may just possibly suggest.

It may help to avoid misconception if a brief description is added of the form of the other movements of a Sonata. If they are not an Air with variations or a first movement, they will be found to be a Rondo, and an extended Rondo may be mistaken by the learner for a first movement. A Rondo has one principal subject to which after an episode or episodes it constantly returns. There are numerous forms of Rondo. Dr. Marx distinguishes five, of which the following are briefly the plans. 1st. Form.—Theme or Subject, Passage, Theme (same), Coda. 2nd. Form.—Theme, Episode (new key), Passage, Theme, Coda. 3rd. Form.—Theme, First Episode, Theme, Second Episode, Coda. 4th. Form.—Theme, First Episode, Theme, Second Episode, Theme, and First Episode in same key, Coda. 5th. Form.—Theme, Episode 1, Coda. Repeat, Episode 2, Theme, and Episode 1, in the same key, Coda. Examples of these Rondo forms and of a first movement will be found in Mr. Curwen's "Commonplaces of Music." The fifth Rondo form, with its repeat of first part, has some resemblance to the form of a first movement. But in the place of the working of the first subjects as in a first movement a new episode is introduced. The following will illustrate the difference.

First movement—1st. Subject, 2nd. Subject in new key, working and recapitulation in one key.

5th. Rondo.—1st. Subject, Episode, or Second Subject in new key, new Episode, and recapitulation in one key.

The principal key of the movement is usually monopolized by the first or principal subject, and generally there is far less attempt at continuity than in a first movement. The subjects and the episodes are rounded off from one another.

The Minuet is a dance-like tune of two strains. Formerly to avoid the monotony of repetition a second or alternative Minuet was added, and it is said that this second Minuet was often played by only three of the performers in order to give effect to the repetition of the first. Hence, naturally the second Minuet was called a "Trio," and now, notwithstanding how many performers are engaged, or in how many parts it may be written, the alternative Minuet is still styled a Trio. The same term is used to name the second melody of a March or a Waltz. Virtually the movement called Minuetto and Trio is a simple Rondo. In many modern symphonies and sonatas, including those of Beethoven, this movement is supplanted by the Scherzo, the Italian word for a jest. In the Scherzo all the lightness, piquancy and playfulness that the composer can command are looked for. Usually the plan of the Minuet is observed, but it is sometimes constructed on the plan of a first movement.

A Sonata or Symphony is named after the key of its first movement. Most grand Sonatas or Symphonies have four or five movements. The first an Allegro (occasionally preceded by a short Introduction extra to the design), is constructed on the plan explained, and the composer's greatest skill is spent, in developing this movement. The second movement is usually slower, and may be cast in the same form or in the Rondo form. The third movement is a Minuet or Scherzo, and the fourth an Adagio, in which the most tender and languishing expression is expected; this movement is either a first movement or a Rondo. Lastly the Finale is a brilliant Allegro or Presto in the form of a Rondo, or more rarely is in that of a first movement.

I have said that there is some resemblance to the form of a Fugue in the form of a first movement. In fact I believe it could be shown that the supple Sonata form has supplanted to a great extent the Fugue form, more because of its resemblance than because of its difference. The first part of a Fugue is taken up by a simple statement of the subjects in closely related keys, the interest of the Fugue not being in the subjects themselves, which frequently are not original, nor in the answer or counter-subject, in neither of which is there any scope for fancy or imagination. But when the subjects are duly presented there is almost absolute freedom of treatment, as in the working of the second part of a first movement. Further, a Fugue often concludes with a recapitulation of the subjects. Two of the most wonderful pieces of music extant combine the two forms in one movement. Examine Mozart's overture to Die Zauberflöte (The Magic Flute) and the last movement of the so-called "Jupiter" Symphony of the same composer, and you will find the essentials of a Fugue and the form of a first movement developed side by side.

The following is a brief technical analysis of the first movement of Mozart's Sonata in F major.—

Measures 1 to 9 1st subject, 10 to 19 1st subject in bass and upper part, and continuation, 20 to 23 tributary to first subject, 23 to 32 tributary &c. varied, 33 to 42 passage made up of fragments of first subject cadencing on the dominant of key C, 42 to 50 second subject in dominant, 50 to 57 variation on and tributary to second subject, 58 to 61 tributary, 62 to 67 passage to prepare for episode, 67 to 71 important episode, 71 to 82 fragment of episode and passage of sequences to, 83 to 90 running passages, 90 to 103 passage to close first part. Second part opens with allusion to first subject in C minor and continues to measure 126 with passages derived from measures 60 to 63 of first part and fragments of the first subject (109 to 111), and the second subject (113 to 115,) and a transposition (at 123 to 126) of the closing passages (100 to 103) of the first part, 126 to 138 in double counterpoint, made entirely from the first measure of the second subject, 139 to 143 passage suggested by rhythm of same, 143 to 146 second transposition of measures 100 to 103, 147 to 154 the first subject in original key, 154 to 156 portion of first subject in F minor, 156 to 158 the same in D♭ major, 158 and 159 the same in B♭ major, 160 to 167 delayed progression of the first measure of the first subject made to lead to transposition of passage in first part (measures 38 to 42), 169 to 200 transposition of dominant matter of first part (measures 43 to 73) to the principal key, 200 to 207 working in double counterpoint of first portion of first subject, with first portion of episode of the second subject (measures 67 and 68), 207 to 220 protracted sequential treatment of the tributary to the episode (measures 75 to 82), 221 to 241 transposition to principal key of measures 83 to 103.

The second movement of the same sonata is on the same plan and the third movement is an extended rondo.

The Voice, and how to Use it.

BY W. H. DANIELL.

[From the Worcester Palladium.]

VI.

Pupil. My dear sir, will you clear up a mystery? I hear people sing sometimes, who say that they deliver their tones naturally, never having "injured their voices by taking lessons." Usually their tones are extremely throaty. Now I have seen old men, singers of forty and fifty years ago, who never studied, yet would, as old men, sing in a manner which I think you would indorse. Now why is this—why should the uneducated singer of fifty years ago, be superior to the uneducated singer of to-day?

Mr. D. Well, it can hardly be otherwise, when the educated singer of fifty years ago was better than the educated singer of to-day. Let us first deal with this fact. I say that the difference is great—am I correct in my assumption? Let us see—who were the singers then in their prime? Griesi, Persiani, Malibran, Sontag, Rubini, Duprez, Tamburini, Lablache, Staudigl, and the English singers Braham, Incedon, Mr. and Mrs. Wood, and a host more. I give the names just as they occur to me and doubtless omit many great ones. Now it may be said that the accounts of these singers were probably exaggerated and that were we to hear them now, our opinion of their singing might change; but it so happens that Griesi and Sontag have sung here, in their old age, and even then there was no younger singer who could compete with either. Staudigl and Lablache are in the memory of a great many living persons, as it is not long since they died. Ask any admirer of these great singers, what were the characteristics of their singing, and unless

I am mistaken the reply would be—clear and pure delivery of tone, distinct articulation, ease and grace in singing. Ask how Rubini compared with Wachtel, and the reply would probably be—there can be no comparisons, where no similarity exists. One sang like a finished artist, the other like a "hack-driver." Artistic rendering was the great thing then, not shouting. A finished performance throughout, not a bad performance, covered up by a single high or low note at the end. Now please remember my remark at the very commencement of these articles. "Public performers are educators." The people who imitated the singers of forty and fifty years ago strove to make as little exertion as possible, to enunciate clearly, to sing forward in the mouth. I met a lady some time since, nearly sixty years of age, whose voice was in perfect order, and who sang ballads more satisfactorily than any concert singers that I can name, yet she never took a lesson of anybody. She had practiced by herself, but then they were not fashionable exercises at all. In fact, in her depth of ignorance, she had actually fallen upon the plan of reading on different notes, just as if that would do any good. So you see the models which one has constantly in sight make all the difference. Now let us take the present day. You see, this is an age of progress. If we make a good article to-day, by to-morrow it is time to adulterate it in some way, so as to lower the price, or else increase the profits. In the old days, only those took up music who had a natural tendency towards it. In these days it is used as a means of subsistence by thousands who know nothing of the soul of it. The consequence is, that a parcel of mechanical music-makers, mechanical teachers, mechanical singers, and mechanical players have come to form what is termed "the profession," and these people necessitate half work. It is the correct thing for every lady to know how to play and sing, but "cheap instruction is as good as any," so many think. Often the piano teacher will teach both playing and singing. "It saves trouble and expense." The piano teacher probably does his best to convey correct principles of singing; but what does he generally know about the matter, more than the pupil? If one were to come to me to study Russian, I should hardly consider myself qualified to teach it, even though I had a grammar to assist me. Now you can see that poor teaching must produce poor results, but as likely to please as the reverse. The present standard of criticism is frightfully low. Now the uneducated singer, following after bad models, will follow the faults as well as the excellencies. A certain partially educated Italian tenor captivated the American audiences several years ago, by the beauty of his voice. He was and is to-day so bad a singer, that he is not even tolerated in his own country, yet here he became the great standard of excellence. To sing like Brignoli was all-desirable. To be told that one's voice was suggestive of Brignoli's was great praise. Yet as a singer, he has always been bad and his tone very throaty. He has been the one imitated, and so you constantly hear throaty tones. I regard his stay in this country as altogether detrimental.

Pupil. But he is not one of the shouting tenors whom you have mentioned, is he?

Mr. D. No, he is the representative of the throaty class. Mazzolini, Lefranc, and Wachtel are good specimens of the shouters. Of course I am instancing only the opera singers, who are the ones usually imitated. There is another class of tenors, who imitate some favorite balladist of the "Mother kissed me in my dreams" type, and who can only be described as namby-pamby. They are usually more or less throaty, but as they are representatives of only faults, we will not waste time on them. I do wish, however, to mention one singer of the genuine type, who dares to sing like an artist. He is not half appreciated, I think, for he sings only his composer, or rather simply interprets him. He does not sing anything carelessly and then depend on a final note, but always gives his best. Why not adopt him as a model, rather than some of the others.

Pupil. I can think of but one answering your description. Do you refer to Geo. L. Osgood?

Mr. D. I do. He is a genuine artist, but one who will not be followed to a great extent, as he is not sufficiently sensational. I do not mean to individualize generally, but cannot refrain in this instance. He has not been treated as warmly by the papers, as was his due, and I think it only fair that he should receive justice, when working in so good a cause.

Pupil. Does he not make use of the falsetto voice?

Mr. D. When occasion requires it he is not afraid to. Conscious of his abilities, he sings to satisfy himself, not his audience. Therein I respect him. We have other genuine singers, but they are not generally recognized as readily as the poor ones. But let us bide our time. America contains musical taste enough. Let us hope that we may come finally to the knowledge of the difference between good and bad. First, however, the standard of criticism must be raised. Critics must know whereof they speak, and then speak fearlessly, upholding the unpopular good, denouncing the popular bad.

Translated for Dwight's Journal of Music.

An Unpublished Ballet by Mozart.

[From the French of VICTOR WILDER, in Le Ménestrel (Paris), Jan. 26, 1873.]

Mozart arrived at Paris (March 23, 1778) just as the Academy of Music had passed through a little managerial revolution. A royal decree had taken the theatre from the control of the city government and of the stewards of the Menus Plaisirs, and put it into the hands of the Sieur Devismes du Valgay, who was to assume entire control and carry it on at his own risk.*

The task did not appear difficult at first sight. During the five years which had just elapsed, Gluck had thoroughly replenished the national repertory, and his incomparable genius had endowed our opera with a host of master-pieces, of which the last, Armida (Sept. 23, 1777), was certainly neither in profit or merit the least distinguished.

Suard's pamphlets, La Harpe's impertinences, the Abbé Arnaud's sharp rejoinders, and Marmontel's epigrams, in exciting the anger of both parties, far from scaring away the general public, had, on the contrary, roused its curiosity, and made the fortune of the theatre.

Gluck's departure, it would seem, would have put an end to these quarrels, or, at least have quieted them. Far from it. In the absence of the general-in-chief the war was carried on with renewed heat and fury; the only change was in the fields of battle, the contests which formerly raged in the theatre being now fought in the newspapers and in the salons,—a change which the director thought was injurious to him. Devismes of course was not pleased at the new aspect of affairs; the quarrels might continue indefinitely if they only took place in his theatre. Possessing a restless and daring disposition, he was ready, at any sacrifice, to rekindle the flame which was now threatened with extinction. Presuming that he could easily recall the partisans of the older French school, and repeat at his theatre the boisterous scenes of 1752, he imported, at great expense, a company of Italian singers, whom he placed under the direction of Piccini, and who were to play the principal works of that master.†

Les Buffons opened at last, Thursday, June 11, 1778, with the Fonte Gemelle (The Supposed Twins). "This opera," says the bill for that night, "will be followed by Les Petits Riens, ballet pantomime by M. Noverre." ‡

* Grimm's Literary Correspondence, Vol. X.

† In 1729 the first company of Italian buffo singers came to Paris, but they failed to make an impression. They produced two works: Il Giocatore and Don Mico e Leobina. Castil-Blaze refers to this event in the Opera Italien, making, however, a comical error in saying that the troupe was under the direction of Lucio Papirio, mistaking the Pircean for a man, Lucio Papirio being the title of a work in which the first of the above-named musical interludes was introduced: Intermezzo nell' Lucio Papirio, says the prompt-book. In 1752 came a second Italian company who, this time, effected a decided revolution. Its first appearance was in La Serva Padrona, August 2, and its success was remarkable. I take occasion to note here a fact little known. An opera by Pergolesi had already been presented at the Comédie Italienne (October 4, 1746), with Riccobini and Signora Monta or Montigni in the cast.—Vide Le Dictionnaire des theatres de Paris, by the brothers Parfait.

Unhappily for the schemes of Devismes, Gluck's broad style, his dramatic recitatives, his startling melopœias had put French ears out of conceit with Italian arias. Transformed by him who "preferred the muses to the sirens," the nation henceforward sought its pleasures in the austerities of Art. Res severa verum gaudium! and despite the merits of some of the singers, despite too Piccini's amiable melodies, the public gaped at the Finte Gemelle.

"With his opera bouffe Friend Devismes chills us;
If 'tis thus he purposes
To amuse the Parisians,
Better keep the doors closed
Than to give us a little something Accompanied with 'Little Nothings.'"

Notwithstanding the malice of this last squib, the new ballet met with a better fate than the ultramontaine opera.

Did Noverre's ballet deserve the favor denied to Piccini's opera? I have been unable to find, either at the National Library, or in the Library of the Opera, the prompt-book of Les Petits Riens. Happily the Journal de Paris of Friday, June 12, acquaints us with the principal features of the ballet, and gives the reader an opportunity to judge of its merits.

"It is made up of three episodes, each of which is distinct in its action. The first is purely anacreontic: it is Love ensnared and engaged; it is a very pleasing composition, and was acted by Mlle. Guimard and Mons. Vestris, Junior, with all possible grace. The second is a game of blind-man's buff; Mons. D'Auberval, the popular favorite, played the leading part. The third is a frolic of Love; to two shepherdesses (Mlles. Guimard and Allard), appears a third (Mlle. Asselin) disguised as a shepherd. The two become violently enamored of the one, who, to undeceive them, ends by revealing herself. The scene is very piquant in effect, in consequence of the intelligent and graceful action of this celebrated trio. It should be noted that when Mlle. Asselin disabused the two shepherdesses, several voices cried bis. The varied figures which concluded the ballet were loudly applauded."

Whatever might have been the opinions entertained concerning the new piece, it is certain that it met with great success. The approving tone of the anonymous journalist—he was not always so good-natured—is sufficient to verify the fact. But Grimm's testimony is equally favorable: §

"It should be noted that there is in this last scene an incident which has never failed to call forth light murmurs [of disapprobation?] in the midst of the warmest plaudits, so true it is that the regard for decency always exercises severe sway in our theatres. It is when the supposed shepherd, in order to undeceive the two shepherdesses, who dispute his contest, ends by permitting them to catch a peep at her bosom. Though the action was performed by Mlle. Asselin with much grace and modesty, the movement always divided the house, and the voices which have cried bis have not overcome those of the more critical spectators."

But neither Grimm nor the Journal de Paris have a word to say for the music, and probably neither gave it a thought. There is nothing surprising in the omission. In works of this sort the pleasure of the eyes must take precedence of that of the ears; furthermore, the greater part of the music of our ballets was then put together with the aid of the scissors and paste pot. Liberal use was made of popular songs and fashionable airs, the words of which, being well-known, were recalled to the memory of the spectator, and served to indicate, precisely, the action of the piece. These were called "speaking-airs" (airs parlants.)

Did any one then suspect that he had been listening to the work of a master?

"And you, men of art,
That I may enjoy myself
When it is with Mozart,
Let them advertise it!"

Now they didn't advertise it. Noverre had taken pains to conceal the name of his co-laborer; and Mozart, fearing to displease his patron, kept a prudent silence. Besides, had the name of the real author been known, would a different impression have been formed? Who in France then knew the sweet and glorious name of Mozart? Even those who remembered the wonderful child would not have suspected the presence of the great and illustrious composer—not even excepting Noverre.

And yet this work, given up with so much careless generosity, deserves the attention of the student. I wish to exaggerate nothing, and while considering this comparatively light but cleverly written work, I shall carefully refrain from invoking the mighty shades of Don Juan and Figaro; but it is none the less true that this delicate little ballet is, in its way, worthy of its immortal author. I shall be told that Mozart when writing this work knew that his name would not come before the public. I admit it. But he had set his heart on captivating Noverre, and on proving to him that he was capable of honoring the protection extended to him. Furthermore, being in full possession of his faculties, he had only to put his pen to paper to produce the most charming and original fancies.

I said in a former article* that the score of Les Petits Riens is composed of an overture and twenty numbers for dancing or pantomime. Of these there are six† which we may at once discard on the word of the master.‡

Critical study will readily detect those which are apocryphal. We are absolutely certain of one of them.§ But if to the five others we only apply the test of style, it is clear, to our eyes at least, that further doubt is not possible.

Independently of the overture, of which Mozart expressly claims the paternity, there are fourteen numbers which must be ascribed to him. All these bear the stamp of the master, and we do not need the previous avowal contained in the letter of July 9 to reveal to us their origin. It is very true that in this letter Mozart seemed to acknowledge twelve numbers only: Ueberhaupt zwölf Stücke werde ich dazu gemacht haben; but überhaupt is hardly intended for an exact expression. It is not then "twelve" numbers, but "about twelve."

Is it not clear, besides, that in limiting the work of the other composers to six numbers he thereby accepts all of the remainder as his own?

Note here, too, that in excusing himself to his father, who had taken him to task for writing for nothing, he would naturally endeavor to belittle his work, and the trifling importance of two pieces (which, after all, amount to but twenty-four bars) would appear to him to justify his little tergiversation.

I consider then as proved that the last fourteen numbers of the work are by Mozart; and I accordingly give them a new enumeration, leaving out of the question the first six numbers which are not by the master.

* Le Ménestrel. November 24, 1872.

† These are the first six of the score found at the Library of the Opera. They doubtless served as accompaniments for the first entrance of the ballet dancers.

‡ Sechs Stücke werden von Andern darin seyn.

§ That numbered "2," and which is, as I have said, the air Charmante Gabrielle.

I will not again consider the overture, having already given an analysis of its instrumentation; it has but one movement. It is not of the conventional classic form, but is that adopted by Gluck in Orpheus; and this sketchy character is peculiarly adapted to the work which it precedes. Let us add that it abounds in charming details, and that it is full of Mozart's peculiar turns of melody: thus the cadence which is found in the opening of Figaro, on Susanna's words Sembra fatto in ver per me: is here repeated, note for note. I now proceed to give a detailed analysis of each number.

No. 1.‖ Largo con sordini. 4-4. C-major. 32 bars. ¶ Strings, 2 flutes, 2 oboes. A very short presto is interpolated leading back to the principal theme.

No. 2. No movement indicated; in the form of a Lied. 4-4. A minor. 18 bars. Strings.

No. 3. Andantino. 2-4. C-major. 18 bars. Instrumentation limited to two violins which accompany two flutes echoing one another. These responsive motifs were probably made from either side of the theatre, suggesting the action in the scene of the blind man's buff.

No. 4. Allegro. 6-8. C-major. 6 bars. Strings. Very short melodrame, indicating as nearly as may be guessed, that the blind-man has just caught one of his opponents.

No. 5. Larghetto. 4-4. F major. 16 bars. Oboe solo, strings, 2 horns.

No. 6. Allegro-Gavotte. 2-4. F major. 64 bars. Strings, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 horns, 2 bassoons.

No. 7. Adagio. 2-4. D-major. 12 bars. Strings, 2 flutes.

No. 8. No movement indicated. 6-8. D-major. 36 bars. Strings, 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 horns. There is a sudden change of movement introducing a theme resembling those which Mozart has so ingeniously interwoven in the last finale of Don Giovanni: the Cosa Rara of Martini, and the Fra due litiganti * of Sarti.

No. 9. No movement indicated. Gavotte-graciosa. 6-8. A-major. 27 bars. Strings, 2 oboes.

No. 10. No movement indicated. Pantomime. 4-4. A-major. 28 bars. Strings.

No. 11. Passe-pied. 3-8. D-major. 16 bars. Strings. The first four bars are precisely the same as the corresponding phrase in the second movement of No. 1 of the six Sonatas for piano and violin dedicated to the Princess Palatine. Observe that this last-named work was also written in 1778, and that it was also engraved at Paris for the first time, from the author's manuscript.

No. 12. No movement indicated. Gavotte. 4-4. B-flat major. 50 bars. Strings.

No. 13. Andante. 4-4. B-flat major. 16 bars. Strings, 2 oboes.

No. 14. No movement indicated. Gigue. 6-8. E-major. 67 bars. Strings, 2 flutes, 2 clarinets, 2 horns, 2 bassoons.

The second performance of Les Petits Riens did not take place until Saturday, June 20. The ballet of necessity followed the fortunes of Piccini's opera, the indifferent success of which was the occasion of some delay before its next appearance. The Journal de Paris, of June 15th, explains the cause of this delay. "The Bass who has just arrived will supply the Signora Farnesi's place in the rôle of Marescial, which she had undertaken as an accommodation."

It was rather venturesome to supply a baritone's place by a Soprano. The Signor Fochetti had little more success than his predecessor, and when produced for the third time, Thursday, June 25, the rôle was taken by the Signor Tozzoni. But the Finta gemelle was no longer on the play-bills after its 4th representation. The ballet, surviving the shock, re-appeared with new scenery, Thursday, August 18.

"It is with renewed pleasure that we have again seen the ballet of Les Petits Riens, composed by Mons. Noverre. The principal parts were executed by Messieurs d'Auberval, and Vestris, Junior, and Mesdemoiselles Guimard, Allard, and Asselin, with all possible skill and grace."

Such was the fate of this delightful work, from the pen of one of the greatest composers by whom Music has been honored.

For a time it amused the curious audience, then disappeared into oblivion, without revealing its mysterious origin.

There was published in 1856, by Mons. Edouard Fournier, an interesting account of Mozart's sojourn at Paris, in which is recorded his connection with Noverre.

It is remarkable that it occurred neither to the author of this work nor to any one of his readers to search out this lost book.

It is true that one of Mons. Fournier's statements was erroneous, for Annette and Lubin, another of Noverre's ballets, he ascribes to Mozart. Now, Annette and Lubin was produced for the first time on Thursday, July 9, 1778. § Mozart in a letter to his father, written that day, could not have referred to the latter, saying it had already been played four times.

It was fated, doubtless, that the book of Les Petits Riens, like La Belle au bois dormant, should remain for nearly a century in dusty libraries, and that ninety-five years should elapse before its discovery and restoration to its true author.

VICTOR WILDER.

A postscript appended to the above article announces that the music of the ballet Les Petits Riens would be produced at a concert in the Grand Hotel, on Thursday, January 30, 1873, in commemoration of the Mozart anniversary, under the direction of Mons. Daubé.

Harvard Symphony Concert.

The Eighth Concert, Thursday, March 13, offered a programme which proved generally welcome,—perhaps none the less so that it was short.

Overture to Byron's "Manfred".....Schumann.
Bass Aria: "Give me back my dearest Master," from the St. Matthew Passion Music.....Bach.
M. W. Whitney.
Entr'acte from the "Manfred".....Schumann.
Overture to "Jessonda".....Spohr.
Aria and Gavotte, from the Orchestral Suite in D.
Bach.
*Concert Aria: "Alessandro, lo confesso,".....Mozart.
N. W. Whitney.
Symphony, No. 8, in F.....Beethoven.

The sunshine of that bright Spring afternoon (instead of the usual gas-light),—hope long deferred through a long gloomy winter,—was not more exhilarating than that happiest of all the Symphonies, out of the darkest winter of Beethoven's life, of which said sunshine was the visible reflection on the walls. Streaming through the windows just below the ceiling, the soft brightness fell upon the glorious head and shoulders of the Sun god high up opposite the stage, while what seemed the essence of all sweetest, purest sunshine gushed forth in the fresh, spring-like harmonies of that delicious Symphony, out of the heart of the divine musician, whose bronze image loomed behind the orchestra. Was it an "enormous idol sternly glaring at its frightened worshippers?" Was not the sun-girt "Apollo, smiling and graceful, springing gayly forward into the Hall," received by music full as smiling and divinely graceful? Could our dear convalescent in his "Easy Chair" have been rolled into that forgiving Hall for one short half hour then, it would have hastened his recovery, for which we all sincerely pray.

Now it is too true that the Eighth Symphony has been better played in Boston than it was that day. But so long as the bright chords did ring out spring-like and exhilarating, so long as the intention and the spirit of the composition were not difficult to catch, so long as the deaf and outwardly wretched Master's inward heaven and sunshine of a great loving, trusting heart were so revealed with all the aid of a conspiring first Spring day, we, for one, should just as soon have thought of counting spots upon the sun as of listening for imperfections in performance. If the Symphony was there—the soul of it we mean,—if it came home to you and me and made us happy, and transfigured the dull daily life, what matter whether the mechanical execution were a little more or less pronounced or scrupulously polished? That is not a matter to be despised, of course, or shiftlessly neglected. But there is such a thing as taking the shadow for the substance, which is particularly unfortunate when the substance happens to be sunshine itself. The performance, in many of its details, might have been and ought to have been better. But the real drawback this time was one admitting of no remedy. The remedy will never come until our city shall contain several times as many good orchestral musicians as it now does,—nor in fact until a Boston public will support not ten Symphony Concerts in a winter, but one or two good concerts every week the whole year round. This alone would make it possible to hold first-class musicians to the work (rehearsals and performance), as they are held to theatres, Quintet clubs, military bands, &c., and as Theodore Thomas alone, among concert-givers, can hold them, by the inducement of a whole year's engagement. In that way orchestra playing (in one and the same trained organization) becomes the business and chief interest of the 50 or 60 men, who otherwise drop out of the ranks at any call from their respective theatres or quadrille bands, or quintet clubs, which pay them in the long run for such loyalty, in spite of any nobler occupation which a few Symphony concerts may offer them. These, and particularly their rehearsals, are always liable to such desertions. Two "Quintette Clubs" were really the cause of the one serious defect in the orchestral performance we are now reviewing; pursuing their Club interests out of town, they took away so many of our best violinists and cellists as to destroy the fair proportion between the string and wind departments of the band. But these things are the exception not the rule. For the most part the musicians have been faithful and have shown a real interest and pride in these endeavors to keep the master works of instrumental music constantly and worthily before a public that enjoys them. Every year has shown improvement in the composition and in the performance of our orchestra. The only fair comparison to make is with our own orchestras before these concerts were established; whoever can go back to that time, will admit that we have made great progress. To find fault with our local orchestras, because in completeness and in uniform precision of performance they fall below the standard of the only real permanent orchestra in the whole country, the only one whose members find their whole occupation in thus practising and playing together all the year round, is unreasonable. The real wonder is that we succeed so well, that so many admirable and delightful concerts have been given, and that our renderings of great works so often (witness the Schumann Symphony in the concert before the last) come near enough to the Thomas renderings, even in technical execution, to suggest comparison; while in spirit and enthusiasm, and in the artistic tone of the whole concert, they more frequently excel than fall below them.

We believe the eighth Symphony was heard with sincere delight by that great audience; some parts of it were never better given here, for instance the Minuet and Trio, with the rich passage for the horns. The little gem of an Entr'acte from "Manfred," too, was almost faultless. And the extremely difficult, impassioned, gloomy "Manfred" Overture, though some of the wind instruments had not quite found their pitch at the start, was on the whole clearly and impressively presented. Of course in that, as in all the pieces, the need of greater breadth of violin and cello tone was felt. The Jessonda Overture by Spohr, also beginning gloomily, and in a morbid mood more commonplace than that of "Manfred," but soon relieved by lively gipsy strains, with something very like the Rossini sparkle in some passages, was given very well indeed.

Mr. WHITNEY's bass tones, both the deepest and the highest, never sounded more majestic. His intonation and his execution, particularly in the Mozart Aria, which is very difficult and full of bravura passages of a wide compass, which might seem written for a bassoon solo, was certain and exact, and the whole style dignified and manly, commanding warm recognition. What one chiefly felt the want of, was more vitality, more elasticity; and this was most felt in the great Bach Aria, which also was not quite so sympathetically accompanied as it might have been, though Mr. EICHBERG's rendering of the violin obligato was artistic; and possibly the piece was taken just a little too fast to move easily. The additional instrumentation by Robert Franz (two clarinets and two bassoons, answering to Bach's organ part) were used. In the Mozart Aria the Italian words were of course more advantageous for the singer. A curious fact regarding Mozart's setting of those words, shows how readily he let the light of his fine genius glid whatever convenient object came to his hand, and how indifferently the same text served for very different situations. Here we have the strong man, the stern ruler (Clisthenes he is called), amazed at the strange impression made upon him by the appearance of a certain person, and at his unwonted experience of some sort of tender sympathy: "Alessandro, lo confesso, stupisco di me stesso. Il volto, il cigno, la voce di costui nel cor mi desta un palpito improvviso," &c.; and then as the Aria begins: "Non so donde viene quel tenero affetto." Mozart composed the piece for a bass singer, Fischer, in the same year with Don Giovanni [1787]. About ten years earlier he had used the very same words for a concert aria for the Soprano voice, which he composed for Aloysia Weber, with whom he was then in love, the sister of the Constance Weber who became his wife. That time the situation supposed in the music and the words was that of a pure and simple maiden startled by the first revelation in her own breast of the tender passion.

The ninth concert (Thursday next) occurs on the anniversary of Beethoven's death, when a Beethoven programme will be presented: 1. First "Leonore" Overture; 2. Triple Concerto for Piano, Violin, Cello (Messrs. FRIEDL, HAMM and FRIEDL); 3. Seventh Symphony. 4. Third "Leonore" Overture.

Chamber Concerts.

Mr. B. J. LANG's first of four concerts was given at Mechanics' Hall, which was entirely filled, on Thursday afternoon, March 6. The programme was inviting.

Pianoforte Concerto, No. 1, in C major, op. 15. Beethoven.

Allegro con brio. — Largo. — Allegro.
(Cadenzas by Moscheles.)

Mr. B. J. Lang.

Songs. { "Returning," Op. 34, No. 6, Mendelssohn.
"To the absent one," Op. 71, No. 3. "
"Suleika," Op. 57, No. 5. "

Mr. Chas. R. Hayden.

Sonata in A major, for Pianoforte and Cello, Op. 69. Beethoven.

Allegro ma non tanto. — Scherzo. Allegro molto.

Adagio cantabile. — Allegro vivace.

Mr. Wulf Fries and Mr. B. J. Lang.

Six little pieces for the pianoforte, Op. 72. Mendelssohn.

§ Journal de Paris, of Friday, Aug. 14, 1778. The second representation of Annette and Lubin took place Thursday, July 16,—which was seven days after the letter to which we allude.

Sonata in D major for two pianofortes, Op. 52. Mozart.
Allegro con spirito.—Andante.—Allegro molto.
 Mr. J. C. D. Parker and Mr. B. J. Lang.

Mr. Lang limited himself to the first two movements of the Beethoven Concerto, wisely, considering their great length. The Allegro is a larger, richer movement than that which opens the second or B-flat Concerto, so that the Cadenza by Moscheles seemed not so disproportioned to the whole. The slow movement is beautiful, full of a deep and tender feeling, but, as in several of the master's earlier Adagios, &c., the same thought and the same mood seem too long drawn out; it required all the fineness of Mr. Lang's touch and phrasing to save the last half from monotony. But the Allegro was delightful; and Mr. SUMNER supplied the outline of the orchestral accompaniment effectively on a second grand piano. It was an uncommonly fine Chickering on which Mr. Lang played, and the two instruments, being brought forward into the open hall, sounded much better than we have heard pianos sound there before.

The Beethoven Sonata in A, one of the most genial and delightful of his works in that kind, which we hear played sometimes with violin, sometimes with violoncello, went to a charm and was keenly relished. Mozart's Sonata for two pianos was a most acceptable novelty, full of the truest Mozart life and charm throughout, and the performance by Mr. PARKER and Mr. LANG was all that could be wished. The six little Kinderstücke by Mendelssohn were a pleasant offering gracefully presented.

We were much gratified, and so were all, we think, by the tasteful and expressive singing of Mr. HAYDEN. His tenor voice is of a pure, sweet, even quality, his style refined and without affectation. The first of the three songs by Mendelssohn is so strikingly good, that we wonder it has not been heard more in the concert room. A knight on horseback in the storm dreams, to the wild music of the winds (most palpably suggested in the accompaniment, which Mr. Lang played very finely), that he has reached the castle of his lady love, who makes him happy, and in this blissful mood he gallops homeward, when an old oak, out of the mingled voices of the resumed accompaniment, cruelly informs him that his adventure was nothing but a dream! One of Heine's romantic little poems, of which Mendelssohn has caught the spirit perfectly. Much might be said, too, of the beauty of the two other songs.

Of the second concert (Thursday of this week) we must speak next time.

On the same afternoon, at the same hour, Mr. CARLYLE PETERSILEA gave a free Piano Recital in the Meissonier, with a choice selection:

Sonata Appassionata, Op. 57.....Beethoven.
 Concerto in G minor, Op. 25.....Mendelssohn.
 Berceuse and Fantasia Impromptu, Op. 66...Chopin.
 Fantasia, on Themes from "Les Huguenots".....Thalberg.

MESSRS. LEONHARD and EICHBERG, on the next day, had Wesleyan Hall uncomfortably full, as usual, for their third matinée. They began with the great Schubert Trio, ever welcome, ever exciting, never disappointing,—the op. 100, in E flat,—Mr. A. Suck taking the 'Cello part. Mr. Leonhard played splendidly, but the strings somehow were not in perfect tune; at least the upper tones of the violin sometimes offended. That marching serenade of the Andante con moto, returning so unexpectedly in the Finale, was delightful; but the whole work abounds in exquisite ideas and happy inspirations. Perhaps no Trio, with the exception of the great "B-flat" by Beethoven, has been so often heard of late years in our city, yet it is always fresh.

Next came piano solos,—Schumann's charming little series of "Scenes in the Woods," op. 82, which Mr. Leonhard played (not for the first time) with the most delicate poetic feeling. These are of the very best things of the kind. Mr. Eichberg's violin was much more like itself in the rendering of a couple of movements from Bach's Sonatas for Piano and Violin. These were most beautiful, and finely rendered. The first, a musing, serious Andante in F sharp minor (ending strangely on the dominant) from the second Sonata, is notable from the fact that its principal theme reappears, though in a different rhythm, in a Song without Words by Mendelssohn (1st Set, No. 2); the latter appropriated it from pure sympathy, no doubt, and by an original treatment made it fairly his own. The other was the Adagio which forms the beginning of the third Sonata, in E major; a very original and noble piece, in which the violin meanders on in sweet poetic reverie, while the accompaniment keeps repeating a short figure of its own and pausing, quite independently (it almost seems) of what the violin is thinking, yet making a most interesting harmonious whole with it.—Those who heard Mr. Leonhard play the "Kakowial" of Chopin at the Symphony Concert, can imagine how much sunshine he brought in with it again into the smaller room, with Mr. OTTO DRESSER to sketch in the orchestral accompaniment upon a second pianoforte.

The fourth matinée (yesterday) presented the great Beethoven Trio, op. 97; Bach's Chaconne for Violin (Miss PERAZIS Bell); Scherzo in C minor, Chopin; and Schumann's Quartet with Piano.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The fourth and last of the Saturday evening concerts was the best of all. The programme was this:

Sextet in G, op. 36, for two Violins, two Violas, and two Violoncellos.....Brahms.
Allegro non troppo.—Schubert.
 Sonata for Piano and 'Cello, in D, op. 54. Mendelssohn.
Allegro assai vivace.—Allegretto Scherzando.—Adagio.—Finale, molto allegro vivace.
 Messrs. SUMNER and HENNIG.
 { a. Romanza, op. 8, No. 9.....Mendelssohn.
 { b. "An den Sonnenschein," op. 38, No. 3. Schumann.
 Mrs. Anna Granger Dow.
 Solos for Violin, "Barcarole".....Spohr.
 "Air" and "Gavotte" from Suite.....Vieuxtemps.
 Charles Hamm.
 Suite in Canon form, op. 10, for two Violins, Viola, 'Cello and Bass.....J. O. Grimm.
Allegro con brio.—Andante lento.—Tempo di Minuetto.—Allegro risoluto.

The two movements from the Sextet by Brahms were among the most fresh and vigorous of the new works presented in this series. They were played with spirit, but the heroic temper of the leading violin was a shade more than up to true pitch in the high tones at times; the close atmosphere of the room must have rendered it difficult to get into perfect tune at once. Messrs. SUMNER and HENNIG gave an artistic and effective rendering of the Sonata Duo by Mendelssohn, which is full of life and of fine contrasts; the broad choral harmonies in the Adagio came out very grandly, Mr. HENNIG having a peculiarly large and generous quality of tone, as well as masterly execution, not excelled by any violoncellist whom we can remember to have heard for many years. Mrs. Dow's bright, pure soprano voice, and finished vocalization won the favor of the audience,—so that she was obliged to repeat the "Sunshine" rhapsody of Schumann (which, by the way, was taken too slow). Her style is simple, unaffected, somewhat cold. Mr. HAMM is an effective solo player, and handles the violin with a sure grasp and searching, subtle power. The term "heroic" is applied to certain operatic tenor singers, and why not as well as to violinists? Mr. Hamm seems to us to be one of this class; of animation, vigor, soaring ardor one can feel sure when he plays; if it were sometimes more subdued, it were still better. The "Air" and "Gavotte" show that Vieuxtemps has been a careful student of the old masters of Bach's period; certainly the imitation is ingenious. The Suite by Grimm gives one more than enough of Canon before the four movements—short ones to be sure—are over. Such perpetual side-by-side imitation is like seeing double. It is as if the two ears were not precisely synchronous in their report. But the work is clever and has music in it. The same man, still prisoner to this fixed idea, has composed another Suite in Canon,—for the full orchestra this time.

Last week there was a lull, an interregnum, among chamber concerts; but this week they have rained again, and without intermission. Thus: Tuesday afternoon, N. E. Conservatory (Schumann Piano Quartet, by Mr. B. D. ALLEN of Worcester, Messrs. EICHBERG, &c.; Songs composed by Mr. Allen, sung by Mrs. WEST, &c.) Wednesday, Miss MEHLIG. Thursday, Mr. LANG. Friday, Messrs. LEONHARD and EICHBERG. Saturday, Miss MEHLIG again. Later in the month Mr. PERAZIS comes on with a couple of matinées, and still later there is promised a series by the new "Beethoven Quintette Club."

We listened lately with great pleasure to the singing of Male Part Songs by the "Boys' on Club," which is composed of some forty fresh young voices, trained to great precision and delicacy by Mr. SHARLAND. The "rehearsal" at John A. Andrew Hall was much enjoyed by an overflowing crowd of invited friends.

Mr. PECK, of Boston Music Hall, offers marvelous attractions for his annual benefit concert, Wednesday evening April 9th. He will have Rubinstein and Wieniawski, the Thomas Orchestra, Miss Annie Cary, Mr. Nelson Varley, and as much more splendor as an audience of mere mortals can well bear.

Mr. John Lodge Ellerton, a well-known amateur composer, died at his house in London, recently, we learn from The Athenaeum. He was born in Chester, and, after taking a degree at Oxford, studied music at Rome. He wrote some dozen operas, never produced in England; an oratorio, "Paradise Lost"; a Stabat Mater, masses and motets, symphonies, and chamber music of all kinds. But, numerous as are his compositions, none of them have made their way.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 15.—Mr. Carl Wolfsohn gave his first "Saturday Night Popular Concert" at the Academy of Music last Saturday evening. The programme was for all tastes. The "Allegretto" of Beethoven's 8th Symphony was worthy of the encore it received. The "Freyschuets" overture and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" March were also really well given. Nervadba's "Lorelei" paraphrase, Lumbye's "Traumbilder" and Strauss's "Blauen Donau" Waltzes completed the orchestral part. Mrs. Gulager, of New York, was the vocalist. Her "piece de debut" was the Polish song "Mignon," and so favorably did she impress her audience that she received an encore. In Part II. she sang Bishop's "Lo! here the gentle Lark" and for encore, Millard's "Waiting." She has a clear, round soprano voice, and her method is most excellent. Herr Benno Walter, in the first movement of Vieuxtemps' E-major Concerto, and in Ernst's "Otello" fantasia, proved himself an artist of a very high order. His playing is brilliant and firm, precise and fresh.

On Tuesday evening, 11th inst., Mr. Gaertner gave the third of his "Classical Concerts" at the Amateurs' Drawing Room.

Quintet, Op. 29, C major.....Beethoven.
 Allegretto, Op. 8, E major.....Gade.
 Andante Cantabile, C major.....Haydn.
 Marchen, Op. 29, D major.....Vrli.
 Nonetto, Op. 77.....Onslow.

This last piece was most grateful to the audience, both from its comparative novelty, and its intrinsic worth, as well as from the smooth and accurate interpretation. The Beethoven Quintet, and in short the whole programme, was rendered in a highly satisfactory manner.

On Thursday evening your celebrated Mendelssohn Quintette Club gave a concert at the Academy of Music under the auspices of Mr. T. B. Pugh. The audience was large and the performance excellent. Rubinstein's F-minor Quintet was beautifully rendered. Mr. Heindl's flute solo was not audible clearly to all of the audience, as he seemed to forget the vast size of the building. Mr. Ryan was very successful in his selection. Mr. Hennig was rapturously welcomed and seems to have improved since he left us. Mrs. Granger-Dow in the "Mignon"

Polonaise was not entirely successful, and in her English song her enunciation was quite defective, but in the duet "with Mrs. Bernard she was exceedingly good. It was the "Letter" Duet from Mozart's Figaro. Mrs. Bernard acquitted herself finely in the Garden Aria from the same opera.

On Saturday evening Mr. Jarvis gave the fifth of his classical Soirees.

Piano Solo. "Grand Sonata." D major....Hummel.
Chas. H. Jarvis.

Violin Concerto in E major.....Vieuxtemps.
G. Gulemann.

{ Impromptu, F major.....Chopin.
Novelette. E.....Schumann.

Chas. H. Jarvis.

Rondo. 2 pianos.....Chopin.
Messrs. Jarvis and Gulemann.

Solo. Violoncello.....Popper.
W. Popper.

Trio. D minor.....Mendelssohn.

On the same evening, Mr. Wolfsohn's second Saturday night concert took place. Miss Drasdil was the soloist, and sang a "Prayer" by Hiller, and an English ballad by Hay. Miss Drasdil was entirely successful; she sang with intense feeling, and her voice is pure and even throughout the whole compass. The "St. Petersburg French Horn Quartet" performed two quartets. It is impossible to describe the perfection to which these men have wrought this ungainly instrument; the placidissimo effects are indeed wonderful. Next week Patti sings us her farewell; and the week after comes the Rubinstein-Thomas combination.

EUSTACE.

Music in London.

Mme. ARABELLA GODDARD'S RETIREMENT.—The Musical Standard concludes its article on this event as follows:

A brief sketch of her career may perhaps be interesting at the present time. Born in 1836 at St. Saens, near St. Malo, of English parents, she soon showed a talent for music, and at the age of six was placed under Kalkbrenner at Paris. The master was famous for his system of fingering, and the child soon acquired a correct method of manipulation and steadiness of time never to be forgotten. After two years' study, Miss Goddard appeared in public, playing one of Hummel's Concertos. In 1846 she was brought to London and placed under Mrs. Anderson; she shortly after played before the Queen and Prince Albert, who took the highest interest in her future career. Thalberg was her next master, and the famous virtuoso boasted that his fair pupil was his only rival. Under the direction of Mr. J. W. Davison, the attention of Miss Goddard was especially directed to classical music, and a tour in Germany developed and strengthened her inclination for the highest species of pianoforte music. She studied composition under Mr. G. A. Macfarren; and now the young artist was well-nigh perfect in the path she had chosen, and regular daily practice soon ripened the debutante into a performer of the very first ability. Not that Mme. Goddard ceased to improve: those accustomed to weigh minute differences noted year by year a more perfect finish in her playing, and a larger grasp and greater breadth in phrasing, showing that self culture was not neglected, and that "excelsior" was still her motto. Her first important appearance in London was, we believe, at the old Promenade Concerts in the Haymarket, in 1850. Three years after she played Sir W. Sterndale Bennett's Concerto in C minor, at one of the New Philharmonic Concerts given in Exeter Hall under Lindpaintner. Since that time she has been before the public constantly, and from the Crystal Palace to the Suburban Concert Room, her career has been a series of triumphs.

In wishing and predicting as much success for Mme. Goddard during her extensive tour as she deserves, we are selfish enough also to wish that she were not going to quit London; and this last wish is greatly increased by the reflection that on the lady's return here, she intends to devote herself entirely to teaching, and that the public will hear her no more. She will leave a void by no means easy to fill. Foreign pianists with limited repertoires, whose style is as exaggerated as their pretensions, may have their short day; at present we know of no one competent to fill Mme. Goddard's place. The last farewell has been said, and midst the universal regret with which she leaves us, it is impossible to help feeling proud of our countrywoman, and watching her colonial and foreign career with close interest. Hope never deserts the human breast; and it may be, that when London is again reached, the fair pianist may be led to reconsider her determination, and not deal so strong a blow at the art of music, as her retirement must necessarily be.

A WAGNER SOCIETY has been formed in London; through some mysterious influence, the musical journals there are ringing with the reformer's praises, while they still hug their prejudices against Schumann's music. The most temperate account that we have seen of the first concert, is that of the Pall Mall Gazette, from which we extract the following:

Meanwhile Wagner is being introduced or re-introduced to us in London; for it must not be forgotten that some twenty years ago he officiated one season as conductor at the Philharmonic Concerts, when several of his orchestral pieces were performed under his direction. Whether through the fault of the public or of the composer, certain it is that these works produced no favorable impression. Nor did the success of the first "Wagner Concert," which took place last week at the Hanover Square Rooms—the first concert devoted specially and exclusively, in this country, to Wagner's music—prove that music to be eminently acceptable, even to an audience composed largely of Germans, with many of whom the question of Wagner's merit is viewed, not so much from a musical, as from a national and patriotic point of view. Much of the music performed was in accordance with the public taste, and much was in Wagner's latest style. But what was in accordance with the public taste was not in Wagner's latest style, and what was in Wagner's latest style was not in accordance with the public taste. We are merely stating facts without wishing to imply that Herr Wagner is to be judged by the likings or dislikings of his audience. It is worth noticing, all the same, that the pieces most applauded were those belonging to his earlier works, which have been often performed, and may often be performed again, without its being at all necessary to construct for that purpose a theatre at Bayreuth or elsewhere. For our part we like and admire the Flying Dutchman (which, however, is never mentioned by professed Wagnerites, and which Wagner himself is said to regard as an error of his youth); we like and admire Tannhauser, and we like and admire the little of Lohengrin that we happen to have heard on the stage. Wagner loses more than most composers by being heard piecemeal in a concert-room; for the creator of the "art-work of the future" does not "flap in numbers," and his whole system is opposed to the elaboration and perfection of particular scenes which, however highly finished, cannot, he maintains, joined together, form a musico-dramatic work possessing unity, but only a musical medley, or mosaic. In London he must be heard at concerts or not at all. But to judge of him as a stage-composer one should witness a performance of Tannhauser at Berlin, or better still, of Lohengrin at Munich, or, best of all, the longest works of his last period, as they are to be given when a theatre fit for their reception and production has been provided at Bayreuth. For this last opportunity, however, it will be necessary to wait, desirable to attend Wagner concerts in aid of the Bayreuth fund, and commendable to join the guarantee committee which is to ensure the organizers of these concerts against the possibility of loss.

In his latest manner, Wagner seems inclined to replace squarely-defined tune by so-called "continuous melody" even in march music, of which, at the Wagner concert, we had a specimen in his vigorous Kaiser March. Still, as a rule, a march in music must be looked upon as something to be marched to; and the bold, effective themes of which the Kaiser March is mainly made up convey no idea of the sort of music which forms the substance of Wagner's operas. They remind one rather of Meyerbeer, as the well-known and undoubtedly effective Tannhauser March (which, again, is no specimen of Wagnerian music in general), must remind every one who hears it of Weber.

At the first of the Wagner concerts a very fine orchestra, under Mr. Dannreuther's able conductorship, did full justice to the Tannhauser overture, the overture to the Meistersinger, the above-mentioned Kaiser March, and various instrumental and semi-instrumental pieces from Lohengrin. Nor must we forget the prayer from Rienzi, which, like the overture to Tannhauser, the Lohengrin selection, and the Kaiser March, excited much admiration. Encores are scarcely a criterion: but however that may be, the pieces most applauded and re-demanded were those of Wagner's early manner; and the public can form but little idea from the Wagnerian entertainment provided for them at the Hanover Square Rooms of the sort of treat that will await, at Bayreuth, those who, by becoming guarantors to the extent of five pounds, will "secure the privilege of choosing four reserved seats at half-price." They will hear a fine singer, however, in Herr Franz Diener, who, at the Wagner Society's first concert, sang, with much earnestness and with all the dramatic power which Wagner's vocal music absolutely requires, Lohengrin's expressive song to Elsa, and Sigismund's intricate "Love song," in the Walkure—the second of the operas included in the Niebelungen series destined for the Bayreuth Festival.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC,
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- All like faded flowers. Song and Cho. 4. E♭ to e. Lutz. 30
Rosalyn. 4. E to e, Dagnia. 30
The Violets blossomed where she trod. 4. F to a. Ryan. 25
The above three songs give evidence of fine workmanship in their composition, and may be safely recommended as effective concert songs.
The Rait. 4. E to f. Pinsuti. 60
A very fine song, descriptive of a shipwreck and escape. Reminds one of the days of Henry Russell and his thrilling musical declamations.
In the Land that lieth beyond. Song and Cho. 3. C to e. Hackleton. 30 Guide us to Rest. 3. E♭ to e. Kaye. 25
Two beautiful songs of a sacred character.
O teach me to forget. Baritone Solo. 4. F to f. Evans. 35
With German and English words. Made on this side the water, but is quite good enough to be one of the "Gems of German Song."
The Handsome Man. From "Boi Carotte." 3. F to d. Offenbach. 30
London Society. 3. E♭ to d. Lee. 35
No! Comic Duet. 3. (5 keys) to f. Schweneck. 60
Three very laughable comicities. "No!" is a duet between Mr. and Mrs. T.
Ave Maria. 4. E♭ to b. Waud. 50
An effective Ave Maria, with Latin and English words.
The Little Gipsy. 3. D (and B♭) to f. Campana. 40
Words like an English Ballad, and music of that pretty, self-sufficient character, which Campana writes so neatly.
I love my Love. 4. B♭ to f. Pinsuti. 30
"O, happy words! At Beauty's feet
We sing them ere our prime."
"The old sweet story," beautifully warbled by Ciro Pinsuti. Good concert song. Words by C Mackay.

Instrumental.

- Souvenir Waltz. 3. C. Wales. 35
An agreeable souvenir, certainly.
Matti. 4 hands. Gird Valse de Concert. 4. A♭. Wels. 1.00
The 4 hand arrangement adds much to the power, without detracting from the brilliancy.
Un Perle de Varsovie. Four Hands. 5. E♭. S. Smith. 75
A sprightly and powerful Polonaise.
Flying Leaves. 4. G. Rosenhain. 30
A sweet "Baritone Air" played principally with the left hand, the right hand accompanying.
Will-o-the-Wisp. Caprice. 4. D. Jensen. 40
As the name indicates, it is light, fitting music, imitating very prettily the dance of a wandering light.
Merry Bird Waltzes. 3. Fahrback. 40
Introduces Parrot and Mocking Bird calls, &c.
Trio Idylles. No. 3. Aventure Rustique. 4. C. Loeschhorn. 30
Graceful, and not long enough to be tedious.
Overture to Poet and Peasant. 8 hands. 2 Pianos. 4. Brunner. 2.25
No overture, probably, is more popular, and it seems to please as a solo, duet or, as in this case, a double duet, and has even made a "sensation" on the organ. Try it by all means in your next Seminary exhibition.
Wedding March. 8 hands. 2 Pianos. 4. Mendelssohn. 90
Well-known as a solo and as a 4 hand piece, but gains evidently in power and brilliancy by this new arrangement. Mem. Be sure to hire an extra piano for your next wedding.

BELSHAZZAR. A Cantata. By J. A. Butterfield.

It is termed perhaps properly, a Cantata, but may also rank as a short oratorio. The story has reference to the taking of Babylon by Cyrus, and the characters, Belshazzar, Cyrus, Daniel, Zerubabel, Nitocris, Shelomith, Festus, &c., as well as the incidents are partly from the Bible, and partly imaginary. Has been given with acceptance, and in costume, as a sacred drama, being "unquestionably endorsed" by the audience.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degree of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.

Gems of Strauss !!

A Collection of Favorite Waltzes, Polkas, Mazurkas, Quadrilles and Dances.

BY JOHANN STRAUSS.

The undersigned have the pleasure of announcing the issue of this new and splendid collection of the most brilliant music; a work already received with enthusiasm, as Strauss, with his marvellously vivacious ways, and wonderful leading power, is now a familiar "presence" with American musicians.

A fine portrait of the composer adorns the title, and the 250 large pages of the book are well filled with the most popular pieces; for proof of which, read the following list of

THE HOUR OF SINGING!

By L. O. EMERSON and W. S. TILDEN.

PRICE $1.00.

"The Hour of Singing" has met with unexpected success, having been introduced into a large number of High Schools; and has also been used with success in the upper classes of Grammar Schools. This success is deserved, as it is an excellent practical work, with the best of music so arranged in Two, Three, and Four Parts, as to furnish pieces well graded as to difficulty, and none of them too difficult.

Ambrosian Hymn
Ask me not why
Birds are singing
Blow on, wild gales
Boat song
Brothers, to our native land
Come, let's be gay Dream on Echoes of the past
Faintly as tolls the
For the blessings
Forth to the battle
Gayly our boat
Gilde, O river
How joyful is the morning
Hymn of praise
In ever-changing orbit
In the west, the sun
Joyful wake the songs
Joys of spring
Keller's American Hymn
Let all men praise the Lord
"Let there be light"
Lord, we come before thee
Loving voices
Meet again
Morning beauty tender
Morning Hymn
My native land [weak
Nay, never say our arms are Now night comes softly
Nymphs of the ocean spray
Old friends and old times
Oh, my native land is fair
On the water
Oh, Praise ye the Lord
Our Father, guide us, keep Parting from home
Penitence [blows
Pluck the rose, while yet it
Red leaves are falling
Shout and sing glad songs
Song should breathe

THE HISTORY OF Thirteen Valuable, or Invaluable, Music-Books!

Sent, Postpaid, on Receipt of Retail Prices.

A FEW years since, it occurred to OLIVER DITSON & Co. to collect in book-form the most popular and valuable of their Piano Pieces. Immediately the taste and judgment of Musical Experts, and the valuable experience of the Salesmen, were put in requisition. A large number of pieces were designated, and of these the best selected: so that, when "THE HOME CIRCLE, VOL. I," was published, it was found to contain, not, perhaps, the most severely classical, and certainly not the most difficult, pieces of the period, but those which were bright, cheerful, popular, — in fact, the favorites of the preceding ten years.

From similar motives, and in a similar way, other books were from time to time issued; until now, in 1872, the great

Each Book contains from 200 to 225 pages of Music.

HOME CIRCLE SERIES

The pages are of
SHEET-MUSIC SIZE.

Contains the following thirteen books, each complete in itself, and constituting, with the others, a most valuable MUSICAL LIBRARY: —

HOME CIRCLE, VOL. I. INSTRUMENTAL.

The book that gave a name to the series. Large number of easy pieces, with a few more difficult. Excellent as a book of recreations for learners. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for presents, $4.00.

GEMS OF SACRED SONG. VOCAL.

A grand book for Sunday evenings. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for presents, $4.00.

HOME CIRCLE, VOL. III.; OR, THE PIANIST'S ALBUM. INSTRUMENTAL.

Contains the choicest pieces published since the appearance of Vol. II. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for presents, $4.00.

OPERATIC PEARLS. VOCAL.

Selected by experienced Opera-Goers. These Songs constitute the staple of all concerts and other entertainments consisting of Operatic Music. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for presents, $4.00.

THE MUSICAL TREASURE. VOCAL AND INSTRUMENTAL.

The latest. Has already received the highest commendations. Ballads, Sacred Music, Student Songs, Opera Songs, Comic Songs, and a fine selection of Instrumental Music. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for presents, $4.00.

THE SILVER CHORD. VOCAL.

A great variety of songs of all kinds. One of the most salable volumes. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for presents, $4.00.

Recently added to the Home Circle Series, August, 1872, making the "baker's dozen," or 13 books,

GEMS OF STRAUSS!

Brought out "after the Jubilee," in consequence of the greatly increased popularity of "Strauss Music." 250 pages packed full of the most brilliant and (all over the world) most popular Dance Music. In price and style uniform with the other books. Sells superbly.

WREATH OF GEMS. VOCAL.

Similar in character to the Silver Chord, of which it may be said to form the second volume. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for presents, $4.00.

GEMS OF GERMAN SONG.

Rightly named. Harmony and melody built up with a skill and care which belongs only to Deutschland. German and English words. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for presents, $4.00.

HOME CIRCLE, Vol. II. INSTRUMENTAL.

Similar to Vol. I., but is distinguished by the insertion of a large number of easy 4-hand pieces. A very convenient book for teachers. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for presents, $4.00.

Gems of Scottish Song. VOCAL.

All collections of Scotch Airs have been ransacked to form this choicest of all the collections. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for present, $4.00.

Home Circle, Vol. IV.; OR, Piano-forte Gems. INSTRUMENTAL.

Contains the most popular pieces published since the appearance of Vol. III. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for presents, $4.00.

SHOWER OF PEARLS. VOCAL DUETS.

The number of talented Duet-composers is not large. Here we have the best works of the best authors. Price, in boards, $2.50; cloth, $3.00; full gilt, for presents, $4.00.

All the above contain songs and pieces condensed and compressed as much as they can be without injury; the object being to give the purchaser the greatest possible quantity of good music for his money. The books that have Duets or other long pieces have nearly 100 between the covers; and, where airs and short pieces are included, 125 to 160 are in a volume. These pieces would, if bought one by one at retail, cost nearly Four Hundred Dollars. As it is,

THE COMPLETE LIBRARY MAY BE BOUGHT FOR THIRTY-TWO DOLLARS.

- SUGGESTION 1. No better present for a Musical Lady than one of the gilt bound volumes.
" 2. No better Wedding-Present than the whole Library.
" 3. No better aid to the entertaining of company in Parlor, Hall, or Vestry, than a number of these fine books ready for use on the Piano or Reed-Organ.

BY C.

Yes, break, strong heart, and in thy music die,—
Die to the hearts that worship not with thee,
And live among thy peers, if such there be
Amid the throned Olympians on high.
Low, tender strains that breathe the passionate sigh,
And great assaults that set the spirit free,
And wild, heroic bursts of ecstasy,
And steadfast triumphs that can fate defy,
Through the wide ocean of thy music swell;
Strange, solemn meanings rush upon my soul
From depths unknown to me; to thy control
I yield, and in thy spirit I would dwell;
But where art thou, oh where, in silent space?
Shall Heaven bring me to thee, face to face?

Gossec.

[Translated from the French for Dwight's Journal of Music.]

IV.

Gossec composed an innumerable quantity of patriotic songs, and took part in all the national fêtes of the period. I have already related how he composed his Hymn to the Supreme Being; to him also was due the music composed for the apotheoses of Voltaire and J. J. Rousseau, and the funeral march for the obsequies of Mirabeau. On this occasion, the tam-tam was employed for the first time. At that period there existed but one in France or perhaps in all Europe. It is impossible to express the effect produced by the introduction of this instrument, of which no previous idea had been formed. Whenever, during the march, which was performed by wind instruments, the prolonged melancholy sounds of the funereal tam-tam reached the ear, cries of terror and fright were heard from the crowd who pressed upon the steps of the cortège. This funeral march was performed also under the Empire at the obsequies of the Duke de Montebello. During the Revolution, Gossec wrote two pieces for the Opera, composed for the occasion, Le Camp de Grandpré, and Le Siège de Toulon. He had been made, conjointly with Sarrette, director of the municipal school of music which preceded the founding of the Conservatoire. But hardly was this latter created than Gossec was appointed one of the five inspectors, and all his time and care were devoted to the prosperity of the new establishment.

Up to this time the study of composition had been especially defective, because the theory had never been explained in a clear and precise manner. The Germans and Italians indeed had a system of regular harmony, but it had not been formulated in any method, nor in any particular work; the elements might be found scattered among various authors, and the school was in some sort traditional. In France it was far worse, the theory was false; it was based upon the ingenious but erroneous system of Rameau, that of the fundamental bass. Musicians had generally adopted it, and its errors had been propagated for more than forty years before any of those who recognized and acknowledged them ever thought of correcting them. Instruction in composition was therefore carried on at the Conservatoire upon entirely opposing principles; thus Cherubini and Langlé taught after the Italian method, while Méhul and Eler had adopted the principles of the German school, and Gossec and Lesueur gave instruction in the French method.

Sarrette, director of the Conservatoire, was no musician, but he was, what in the case in question was far better, an excellent logician. He saw that it was impossible to have any proper instruction unless they could unite in adopting a body of doctrine. But who would undertake to formulate one? Gossec had had as a pupil a young musician of a subtle and ingenious turn of mind, reflective and somewhat cold, but clear and sagacious; this young man, having acquired from his master a theory with which he was far from being satisfied, determined to study the German and Italian systems. He resolved to blend the principles of the three schools in a work which should unite the best elements of each, and succeeded in composing a treatise upon harmony, which, while recognising the theory of chords, not like Rameau, according to their algebraic origin, but after their rational and musical essence, reconciled the most contradictory ideas, and explained in the clearest and most intelligible manner the principles of an art, the acquisition of which had hitherto seemed the more difficult, because those whose duty it was to teach it found themselves incapable of explaining its elements.

Sarrette, as I have said, had convoked a sort of congress of composers and theorists. For six months they had been in session; always discussing, sometimes disputing, but making no progress, and the solution of the main question was almost despaired of, when the young man I have mentioned went to Sarrette and presented his work. Sarrette already knew Catel, for he it was, through some meritorious compositions, but as a theorist he did not appreciate him. He invited him to submit his method to this assembly of composers who could come to no understanding. These gentlemen were divided into three altogether distinct camps. Cherubini and Langlé represented the Italian school; the combatants for the German method were Méhul, the elder Rigel, Martini and Eler, while the French school had for its champions Gossec, Lesueur, Rey and Rodolphe. Catel presented himself modestly before this august tribunal to submit his work to them. He prefaced it by an address in which he showed both his wit and his modesty, affirming that, far from wishing to overthrow or build up one school more than another, his sole aim was to profit by the excellent principles he had found in each, and to unite them all in one system. This exordium disposed his audience favorably toward him, and the reading of the treatise finished the work so well begun. Hardly had the theory deduced in the first pages been fully explained, when shouts of "Bravo!" and "Good!" from the Germans and Italians interrupted the reader every moment. The French meantime kept silence. When the reading came to an end, the Germans and Italians rose and said: "Those are precisely our opinions; that is what we wished, but were not able to formulate. Our doctrine is all there, it is that of reason and of truth."

"And you, gentlemen?" said Catel, delighted, turning toward the partisans of the French school.

"My child," said Gossec, stretching out his arms toward him, "for more than forty years I have been walking in darkness; you have opened my eyes to the light. Come, embrace your master, who will henceforth be your pupil."

Catel threw himself on the good old man's neck. The cause was gained. According to his promise, Gossec studied his pupil's method and made it the base of his own instruction.

At the foundation of the Institute, he was made a member, and was decorated with the Legion of Honor soon after the institution of that order. His glorious old age was devoted to instruction, and besides Catel, we may name among his principal pupils, Dourlen, Gosse and Panseron. In 1814, at the Restoration, the Conservatoire was temporarily suppressed, and its founder, Sarrette, retired with a pension. When the Conservatoire was re-opened, under another title and with a new organization, Gossec would not resume his functions, less perhaps, on account of his great age, than from a desire to share voluntarily the disgrace of his old friend and companion, Sarrette. Gossec was then eighty-one years of age. It was time for the hour of repose to strike for him, but he preserved all his love for musical art, and never ceased to be interested in it. He attended assiduously all the meetings of the Institute and read some remarkable reports. He lived in the Place des Italiens, and every evening his servant-maid, (he had long been a widower, and besides his conductress had no other society,) attended him to the theatre Feydeau, where he occupied the last seat on the balcony at the left of the spectator. The habitués carefully preserved his place, which was never let. If, by chance, it was occupied by some stranger or provincial ignorant of his habits, he would touch him lightly with the end of his cane: "Get out of the way," he would say, "I am Gossec, that is my place." There is not a single instance of resistance to that celebrated name; every one bent before the double royalty of age and talent.

However, by degrees his faculties declined; in 1823, his mind, formerly so vigorous and so penetrating, had become so much enfeebled that he scarcely recognized his oldest and best friends. Barrette watched over him constantly; he thought that a residence in the country could not but be beneficial to him. Intellectual life was entirely extinct within him; Paris could afford him neither comfort nor pleasure. Having no family, he was left entirely to the care of the servant who had been for many years accustomed to attend upon him. This woman was married, and she and her husband retired to Passy with the poor old man. His fortune consisted of his pension from the Conservatoire and his salaries from the Institute and the Legion of Honor. All his resources would die with him, it was therefore for the interest of his servants to prolong an existence to which they owed an unexpected benefit, for Gossec's income was given up to them, while his own wants required the expenditure of scarcely half that sum annually. Thus his last days were tranquil and happy, if we may call that life happy which is little more than vegetative. He preserved much of his physical strength and took quite long walks in the Bois de Boulogne. When he reached Ranelagh,

"Ah! ah!" he would say, observing the building, "that is the Opera-Comique, is it not?"

His conductress, careful not to contradict him, always agreed with him.

"Well! let us go in."

"Oh, no," she would reply; "you forget that to-day is Easter and they are not playing; we will come back to-morrow." The next day he would be told that it was Christmas or some other festival, and every day he went away happy in anticipation of the pleasure he was to enjoy on the morrow. Thus he lived upon illusions until his last hour. Was I not right in saying that he was happy to the last? He died at the beginning of the year 1829, having attained his ninety-sixth year.

The career of Gossec offers one peculiarity quite remarkable in the history of art. Fate willed that he should always precede in his career some man of genius who should come and seize the position he had attained, yet without Gossec's own labors having opened the way for his successor. A singular fatality raised him up unknown rivals from every corner of Europe. He began with symphonies, which ought at least to have secured him the supremacy in that style of composition, and when his celebrity seemed the most assured, the works of Haydn appeared in France. He composed a mass for the dead which passed for the masterpiece of the period, but as soon as that of Mozart became known, it disappeared in oblivion. Grétry and Gluck appeared just in time to arrest him in the career in which he had preceded them. He founded the first school of song which ever existed in France; hardly was the edifice commenced when the Revolution came and overthrew it, building upon its ruins the Conservatoire, an establishment of such brilliant reputation that it has caused the very existence of the modest school which preceded it to be forgotten. But one uncontested title remained to him, that of theorist, and his own pupil bore away from him this last crown. His ignorance of this species of injustice on the part of fate constitutes Gossec's highest praise. Not only was he not aware of it, he may be said to have seconded it by the kindly support he always gave to the rivals who were to dethrone him. He it was who aided Gluck to accomplish the revolution which was to annihilate the musical system in which his works were written; he was the first to make known the compositions of Haydn, which condemned his own to an eternal oblivion. It was because Gossec had that quality so rare among artists, the love of art for its own sake, making always a complete abstraction of his own person and his own works. He was of the small number of those who rejoice at the success of another artist; he was one of those, in short, who see only brothers and not rivals in their competitors. Gossec was, perhaps, not a genius of the highest order, but he had immense talent. We can readily recognize this when we reflect on the imperfection of his early education, at a time too when there was no organized musical instruction, and when the few principles inculcated upon pupils rested upon foundations so false that it took no less trouble to forget them in practice than it had required time to learn them in theory. The compositions of Gossec may contest without too great disadvantage with the fresh and animated works of Méhul and Chérubini; what an amount of talent was required for him to attain such a result, him too, who had had no model, since such models as he had were already excelled by his own works!

At present nothing remains to the public of all Gossec's works; but they live entire in the history of the art in which, from the multiplicity and variety of his labors, he deserves to occupy a high position. What still lives, is the memory of his goodness and of his noble character, a memory which can never fade in the hearts of those who knew him. Too young to be capable of appreciating him when he enjoyed the possession of all his faculties, I have but a confused recollection of his features and his figure: what I do remember perfectly is the respect which he met with on every hand, the veneration which his name and person inspired; and these recollections of my childhood must plead my excuse for the length of my narrative. Could I, however, have said less, or have neglected the details of the long and honorable career of this composer, who had the singular fortune of hearing in Paris the last performance of the operas of Lully, and of witnessing the first triumphs of Rossini?

The First Birmingham Musical Festival.

[Abridged from the Birmingham Morning News.]

It is now one hundred and five years since the first gathering of this kind was held in Birmingham. Since 1768, the population has risen from under 40,000 souls to over 343,000, and the local music meetings have advanced no less rapidly in importance. And, for the Benefit of this Public Charity, on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, the 7th, 8th, and 9th of September, 1768, "Il Penseroso," &c., "Alexander's Feast," and the "Messiah" were performed. "Il Penseroso" and "Alexander's Feast" at the theatre in King Street in the evening; and on Thursday morning, in St. Philip's Church, Handel's Tes Deum and Jubilate, the Coronation and other Anthems, and the Messiah on Friday morning at the same place.

The committee of management engaged the best vocal and instrumental performers, at least they secured the services of artists able to effectually execute the music set down in the programme. To have allotted the principal vocal parts in Handel's oratorios to Italian opera singers would have been very injudicious. The music was such as required English vocalists for its interpretation, and the Festival Committee wisely engaged none but English vocalists as principals.

The result of somewhat extended inquiries as to the magnitude of the orchestra at the first Birmingham Festival is that the performers numbered about seventy. The precise proportions of the various departments is uncertain; but basing our calculations upon what is known of the orchestras of the period, we may suppose that the chorus comprised about forty vocalists, and that in the instrumental band there would be probably six first violins, four second violins, two violas, two violoncellos, two double basses, one flute, two oboes, one bassoon, two horns, two trumpets, and a pair of drums. To these must be added the four principal singers and the organist. The instruments enumerated would form what may be called a complete Handelian orchestra, the band being such an one as would be required for an effective rendering of the works of Handel, and, with the exception of the trombone, comprising every species of instrument used at the great Westminster Abbey Commemoration in 1784, when the number of performers was five-hundred and twenty-five.

The names of the principal singers, and of a number of the principal instrumentalists, have been preserved. The first soprano was Mrs. Pinto. As Miss Brent she had before her marriage made a great reputation. She was born about 1715, and became a pupil of Dr. Arne, making some of her earliest essays in that composer's operas. Dibdin, in his History of the Stage, says: "Mrs. Pinto, possessing an excellent voice, and being under a master, the great characteristics of whose musical abilities were natural ease and unaffected simplicity, was a most valuable singer. Her power was resistless, her neatness was truly interesting, and her variety was incessant. Though she owed a great deal to nature, she owed a great deal to Arne, without whose careful hand her singing might, perhaps, have been too luxuriant." Mrs. Pinto retained her vocal powers for a long period. When nearly seventy she sang "Sweet Echo," in "Comus," at Covent Garden.

The principal tenor singer at this Festival was Charles Norris, who was born at Salisbury in 1740. When a boy he was a chorister at the Cathedral of that city, and his beautiful voice and fine style attracted the notice of some patrons of art, who induced him to study for the stage. He left the theatre to become an oratorio and concert singer; settled in Oxford, took the degree of bachelor of music, and was appointed organist of St. John's College. At the great Commemoration of Handel, in 1784, he was one of the principal tenor singers, and Burney speaks in high terms of his pathetic delivery. His last efforts in public were at the Commemoration of 1790, and at the Birmingham Festival of the same year. He died, ten days after his last appearance in public, at Imley Hall, the seat of Lord Dudley and Ward. Norris was a good musician. He left some fine anthems, glees, and songs, and also some examples of instrumental music.

Very little can be said about the other two principal singers at the Festival of 1768. Mr. Matthews resided at Oxford, and his name appears in the list of the principal basses for the Commemoration of Handel, in 1784. He continued to sing secondary parts at the Birmingham Festivals until 1790. Mr. Price's name is to be found in the lists of principals at some of the annual meetings of the Three Choirs of Worcester, Hereford, and Gloucester.

The leader of the instrumental band was Thomas Pinto, the husband of the principal soprano already noticed. He was born in England, of Italian parents, and, when a boy, was a remarkably clever player on the violin, being frequently employed as the leader of large bands. He was a careless performer, and used to boast that he could play difficult solos better at sight than after practice, for if the music was quite strange, he could not be looking about him instead of looking at his copy. He was for some time deputy leader under Giardini, at the King's Theatre, and afterwards leader at Drury Lane. He died in Ireland in 1778. Another of the principal violinists was John James Latas, musician to the Duke of Marlborough at Blenheim, and the composer of a number of pieces for the violin. He died in 1777.

The conductor was Mr. Capel Bond, of Coventry. His duties were, according to the custom of the period, to play the organ at the morning performances. The real labor of directing the music devolved upon the leader of the band. Mr. Bond resided at Coventry, and was appointed organist of St. Michael's Church, in that city, in 1750, and also of the Church of the Holy Trinity in 1752. He died in 1790. Soon after his first appointment at Coventry he commenced a series of oratorio performances in Birmingham, and it is probable that this induced the managers of the Festival to engage him as their conductor. The various performances took place as announced; and in addition after each of the evening performances a ball was held at Mrs. Sawyer's, in the Square.

It is observable of the programme of music performed at the first Birmingham Festival that it was almost all selected from the works of Handel; an Anthem by Boyce, and instrumental pieces by Mr. Bond and Mr. Pinto, being the only exceptions. At the time there was very little music available for concerts on a large scale, and when scores were procurable, the whole of the parts had to be written out for the performers. That the oratorios written by Englishmen—Greene, Arne, Stanley, Worgan and Arnold—were generally unworthy of a place along with the works of the mighty master who produced "The Messiah," "Israel in Egypt," "Judas," and "Samson," is pretty well proved by the fact of their having fallen into oblivion. There were a few cantatas, such as Galliard's "Hymn of Adam and Eve," which for some years were regarded with favor; but of all the compositions of the period for the concert-room, Handel's alone are now esteemed. The introduction between the acts of a concert of an instrumental concerto demands a slight notice. The custom was an old one. When Handel, in 1739, gave "Alexander's Feast," at the Crown and Anchor, for the benefit of the fund for the support of decayed musicians, "a new concerto, composed by Mr. Handel on purpose for the occasion," was announced; and in the advertisements of his Lenten oratorios, "new concertos for the organ and other instruments" are frequently mentioned.

The first Birmingham Festival was a great success. The tickets of admission were five shillings each, and the receipts, together with donations given at the church doors on Thursday morning, amounted to £800. The expenses were £501; so that a net profit of £299 was made for the Hospital.

The Voice, and how to Use it.

BY W. H. DANIELL.

[From the Worcester Palladium.]

VII.

Pupil. You have made mention of two great basses, Lablache and Staudigl. Some little time ago you spoke of some bass singers enlarging their tone too much. Now I would like to know something about the proper action of the bass voice, for it is evident that I have had ideas that you would not consider correct. For instance, I heard an eminent singer on one occasion sing E, with what you would designate as an open tone. The effect was very startling, for the passage required great power.

Mr. D. It is probable that the effect would be startling, but was it agreeable to the ear?

Pupil. Well, I thought so at the time, or rather—I am not sure that it occurred to me to think whether it was agreeable or otherwise—I expected a loud tone and it came, and consequently I was not disappointed; but as to expecting a tone which should be pleasant to the ear, I do not think I should have desired it. The passage did not call for it; it simply needed loudness.

Mr. D. Then it might as well have been one noise as another. By loudness of course you mean noise. Now let us see how that idea would operate. The violinist wishes to gain greater power from his instrument than it is capable of properly producing, and we speak of the "rasping" effect. The cornet player desires more tone than his instrument will properly give, and we speak of the "noisy blare." The tragedian forces his voice, and we accuse him of "ranting." So you see that loudness is not the only thing desirable. Legitimate power we do want, but that does not consist in shouting. But you have hit upon a matter which needs some attention. A great many bass singers do just this thing of which you have spoken. Let us now go back a little to the action of the organs again. I will repeat that all sound is the result of vibration, and in the case of the voice, of the vibration of the muscle called the vocal chord. A certain number of vibrations per second produce a given tone, and a certain number more per second produce a certain higher tone. Now it is evident that with the same chord the only way to increase the rapidity of the vibrations is by shortening them. But let us take an example which all must understand. A Tuba is a brass instrument used for the bass of a brass band. It can of course be made a very effective solo instrument if desired. Now let the performer play the "Star Spangled Banner." This is a tune which extends over a considerable range, and when sung by a bass, is usually I believe taken in the key of G, which carries the highest note up to D. The line in which this occurs is the fifth:

"And the rocket's red glare,"

and the usual way to do it, is to give a perfect yell, for I can call it nothing else, on the D. Now notice the Tuba. The tone gradually points off as it ascends, the upper tone being full and resonant, but in proportion. It must strike you that the tone that was sung was wholly out of proportion to the rest.

Pupil. Then you would designate the tone which I thought was so fine, by the name of "yell." It seems to me that you are very hard to please. Do you ever hear anything or anybody that is right?

Mr. D. Now you are repeating what many others say. I understand that people do me the honor to believe that my standard is so high, that none can attain to it. I think you will find, however, that I have indorsed some singers as being good examples of their art. You will find that I only oppose wrong that is proved to be such. I am not hypercritical, but aim at genuine progress. I detest humbug and false show. I admire sincerity in all things, and in singing as well as in other matters. I despise the man who does a good action for the sake of popular applause, and I despise in the same way the singer who bids only for popular applause. As one should do right for its own sake, so one should sing honestly for no other motive than because it is right and just to his composer and his listeners. I am perfectly aware that my position is rather a Quixotic one, so considered, but I am in earnest in my views.

Pupil. Well, please indicate the best bass singers than you can name.

Mr. D. I imagine, from all accounts, that Lablache and Staudigl were both as near perfection as possible, though I have nothing but tradition to guide me as to Lablache; but I once knew a Baritone singer who claimed to have been a pupil of Staudigl. He had a splendid voice, but was a bad singer, which led me to think that he had not been a faithful student; but one thing was very noticeable. He could sing high G with perfect ease. His voice tapered off beautifully, from which I gather that he was so taught by the great master. Badiali was a wonderful singer. His delivery of tone was easy and natural. No trying to make tone too large—all was beautifully shaped. He was an old man when he died, but preserved his powers to the last. The present race of Italian teachers seem to aim for making the upper part of the voice large and shaky. It may be said that the first fault produces the second. What is the effect? The real beauty of the voice disappears, and the voice becomes dry and unsatisfactory. I always feel troubled when I find people so mistaken, knowing as I do, that they might be far more acceptable singers, if they would be more natural. There it is again, they should be more natural. The effect of that would be to make them sing as they would speak, and consequently deliver their voices in the same way for both. I heard a singer not long since, having a charming voice, but wrongly delivered, and thought to myself: "How I should like to have you hear your own voice once, just to realize how far superior it is to this false voice, which you think is yours." But he probably never will know what a treasure he has, nor will anybody else who listens simply to his artificial voice.

Pupil. You speak of a shaky tone, as if that were a blemish. I had an idea that it was an evidence of cultivation. Certainly, those studying under Italian teachers generally use the tremolo, so-called.

Mr. D. So they do, and I can only account for it from the fact that the majority of Italian teachers, at least those in this country, are decayed opera singers. When their voices fail them, they take up teaching for a livelihood. Some of the most fashionable teachers cannot sing a song respectably. Do you question my statement? Begin the list of fashionable teachers in New York, for instance. The ablest teacher there, or rather in Brooklyn, commenced teaching in the full glory of her powers, and can to-day surpass any concert singer that I can name; but where is there another? I do not know of one. Now I fail to see how a system of singing which will not last Signor or Signora who ever it may be, can be the best thing for a pupil. The faults of the teacher will be imitated. The shaky voice is the result of over-straining the vocal chord. The pupil imitates it, and lo! the fashionable tremolo.

Negro Folk Songs.

SLAVE MELODIES OF THE SOUTH.—THE JUBILEE AND HAMPTON SINGERS.

The Editor of the New York Weekly Review, in the article which follows, shows a just interest in the untutored religious melodies of the ex-slaves of our Southern States. The collection to which he alludes of these songs, set down in notes by Mr. Seward, may be found appended to an interesting volume just published by Lee & Shephard of this city, entitled "The Jubilee Singers of Fisk University," presenting, in a couple of hundred pages, an account of that institution and its teachers, the personal history and portraits of the singers, a chronicle of their successful musical and missionary tour through the Union, and, as we said before, an Appendix containing the words and notes of about sixty of the songs.

At last the American school of music has been discovered. We have had accomplished virtuosi, skillful vocalists and talented composers. They have, however, all trodden the beaten track. It has remained for the obscure and uncultured Negro race in this country to prove that there is an original style of music peculiar to America. This school is found in the songs of the Southern blacks, and they have been but lately made familiar to Northerners by the efforts of two groups of colored singers who have lately given concerts in our principal cities. Both of these bands of wandering minstrels are working in aid of meritorious educational institutions.

The Jubilee Singers who appeared here some months ago represent the interests of Fisk University, of Nashville, Tennessee. They are nine in number, including: Ella Sheppard, pianist and soprano; Jennie Jackson, soprano; Maggie Porter, soprano; Minnie Tate, contralto; Eliza Walker, contralto; Thomas Rutling, tenor; Ben. M. Holmes, tenor; I. P. Dickerson, bass; and Greene Evans, bass. They have sung in most of our Eastern cities with excellent pecuniary success; and the quaint, weird melodies in which their natural talents and acquired skill have been exercised, have been further made familiar to the public, through a collection of some fifty of their favorite songs which were reduced to musical notation by Mr. Theodore F. Seward of this city. Of these songs the editor of the little book containing them, and published by Bigelow and Main of this city, says:

"The Songs—Of these neither the words, or the music have ever before been published, or even reduced to written form, at least, to the knowledge of the Jubilee Singers.

"The most of them they learned in childhood—the others, which were not common in the portion of the South in which they were raised, they have received directly from those who were accustomed to sing them. These songs, therefore, can be relied upon as the genuine songs of their race, being in words and music the same as sung by their ancestors in the cabin, on the platform, and in the religious worship.

"By the severe discipline to which the Jubilee Singers have been subjected in the school-room, they have been educated out of the peculiarities of the Negro dialect, and they do not attempt to imitate the peculiar pronunciation of their race. They have also received considerable musical instruction, and have become familiar with much of our best sacred and classical music, and this has modified their manner of execution. They do not attempt to imitate the grotesque bodily motions or the drawling intonations that often characterize the singing of great congregations of the colored people in their excited religious meetings.

"It is true, however, both of the words and the music, that whatever modification they have undergone, has been wholly in the minds of the Singers under the influence of the training and culture they have received in the University of which they are members."

The music of these songs is generally strikingly wild. Some of them at once recall the "break-downs" made familiar to us by the negro minstrel troupes. Others suggest ordinary Sunday School hymn tunes; but the majority are unique in construction, rhythm and melody. The cultivated musician will at once perceive that they are crude and childish, but he cannot deny their originality.

The success of the Jubilee Singers seems to have inspired a number of the pupils of the Hampton, Va. Academy to "go and do likewise," and a band of nineteen members have started out on a similar mission. Being greater in force, they are more efficient in choral effects, and if less cultured than their predecessors, their performances are even more characteristic. They have given three concerts in New York (at Steinway Hall) and have, on each occasion been greeted by large and enthusiastic audiences.

The institution in whose aid their concerts are given is amply described in their programmes. It is situated in the town of Hampton, Virginia, near Fort Monroe, and the mouth of the Chesapeake Bay, and by one of the curious coincidences of history, close to the spot where the first slaves brought to this country were landed. Here, too, the famous order declaring black fugitives to be "contraband of war" was issued, and here was established the first school for Freedmen, from which, in the providence of God, this existing institution has been developed, beginning under the auspices of the American Missionary Association and the Freedmen's Bureau, and drawing its support mainly from Northern benevolence.

The Jubilee Singers aimed to secure twenty thousand dollars with which to pay off a mortgage on their University Buildings. The needs of Hampton Normal College are much greater. The Institute wants not less than $135,000, and must raise $75,000 of this amount during the ensuing year. In their appeal to the Northern public the Hampton singers say:

"The women of the North could do no better deed than to reach out helping hands to these sisters of theirs, to whom, as yet, the nobler fields of woman's kingdom are terra incognita, and by wise and timely assistance, to lead them to that knowledge of better things, which they, themselves, unaided, cannot reach.

"The young men and women who sing before you to-night know their own need and the need of their race, and we ask you if there is nothing in their wild music and dusky faces which brings before you the pathos and terror of their past, nothing which reminds you how deep their ignorance has been, and how dependent their future still is upon the loving kindness and reasonable charity of their fellow-citizens?

"It does not appear to us possible that this appeal can be unheeded by the wealthy and charitable communities of the North. Every one will acknowledge the first great need of the emancipated negroes to be Education; and this can be best furnished to them through such organizations as the Hampton Normal Institute."

The words of these negro songs are as curious as the music. They are marked by an oriental gorgeousness of imagery, which sometimes approximates to poetical genius and oftener descends to mere nonsense. As originally they were only preserved orally, they are replete with repetition. In most of them the first strain is of the nature of a chorus or refrain, which is to be sung after each verse, and the return to this chorus should be made without breaking the time.

We give a few specimens of this strange religious poetry—this quaint hymnology of an ignorant, uncultivated, yet pious and devotional race. The most noticeable is "Go down, Moses," a song which is not without historical interest, as it expresses the yearnings of the Southern slaves for freedom and their half-formed hopes of emancipation:—

When Israel was in Egypt's land,
Let my people go;
Oppressed so hard they could not stand,
Let my people go.

Go down, Moses, way down in Egypt's land,
Tell ole Pharaoh, let my people go.

Thus saith the Lord, bold Moses said,
Let my people go;

If not I'll smite your first-born dead,
Let my people go.

Go down, Moses, etc.

We need not always weep and moan,
Let my people go;

And wear these slavery chains forlorn,
Let my people go.

This world's a wilderness of woe,
Let my people go;

O, let us on to Canaan go,
Let my people go.

What a beautiful morning that will be,
Let my people go;

When time breaks up in eternity,
Let my people go.

After a score of verses in this style, the "poem" closes with a characteristic expression of denominational preference:

The Devil he thought he had me fast,
Let my people go;

But I thought I'd break his chains at last,
Let my people go.

O take yer shoes from off yer feet,
Let my people go;

And walk into the golden street,
Let my people go.

I'll tell you what I likes de best,
Let my people go;

It is the shouting Methodist.
Let my people go.

I do believe without a doubt,
Let my people go,

That a Christian has a right to shout,
Let my people go.

A spirited unison chorus is sung to these words:

I'm a travelling to the grave,
I'm a travelling to the grave, my Lord,
I'm a travelling to the grave,
For to lay this body down.
My massa died a shouting,
Singing glory, Hallelujah!
The last word he said to me
Was about Jerusalem.

The succeeding verses ad infinitum are simply formed by substituting the words "My Missis" or "My Brother" for "My Massa." It will be readily seen that the song can thus be prolonged till lungs and patience are both exhausted.

An odd little trifle is entitled "Many thousand gone."

1 No more auction block for me,
No more, no more,
No more auction block for me,
Many thousand gone.
2 No more peck o' corn for me, etc.
3 No more driver's lash for me, etc.
4 No more pint o' salt for me, etc.
5 No more hundred lash for me, etc.
6 No more mistress' call for me, etc.

One of the most beautiful in point of melody is "Steal Away."

Steal away, steal away,
Steal away to Jesus.
Steal away, steal away home,
I ain't got long to stay here,
My Lord calls me,
He calls me by the thunder;
The trumpet sounds it in my soul,
I ain't got long to stay here,
My Lord calls me—He calls me by the lightning;
The trumpet sounds it in my soul;
I hain't got long to stay here.

CHORUS.—Steal away, &c.

A great favorite is the following:

1 Gwine to ride up in the chariot,
Sooner in the morning;

Ride up in the chariot,
Sooner in the morning;
Ride up in the chariot,
Sooner in the morning,
And I hope I'll join the band,
O Lord have mercy on me,
And I hope I'll join the band,
And I hope I'll join the band.

2 Gwine to meet my brother there, Sooner, etc.
CHORUS.—O Lord have mercy, etc.

3 Gwine to chatter with the Angels, Sooner, etc.
CHORUS.—O Lord have mercy, etc.

The most difficult of all for any one save a Southern negro to sing—difficult on account of its incomprehensible rhythm is this:

Didn't my Lord deliver Daniel, d'liver Daniel, d'liver Daniel,

Didn't my Lord d'liver Daniel, and why not a every man?

He deliver'd Daniel from the lion's den,
Jonah from the belly of the whale,
And the Hebrew children from the fiery furnace,
And why not every man?

Didn't my Lord deliver Daniel, d'liver Daniel, d'liver Daniel,

Didn't my Lord deliver Daniel, and not a every man?

2 The moon run down in a purple stream,
The sun forbear to shine,
And every star disappear,
King Jesus shall be mine.

CHORUS.—Didn't my Lord, etc.

3 The wind blows East and the wind blows West,
It blows like the judgment day,
And every poor soul that never did pray, 'll be glad to pray that day.

CHORUS.—Didn't my Lord, etc.

4 I set my foot on the Gospel ship,
And the ship it begin to sail,
It landed me over on Canaan's shore,
And I'll never come back any more.

CHORUS.—Didn't my Lord, etc.

These dusky song writers seem to have a special enmity against "Ole Pharaoh." One song declares the intention of the writer to forward a letter to "Massa Jesus to send some valiant soldier to turn back Pharaoh's army, Hallelu!" and closes with gusto:—

When Pharaoh crossed the water,
The waters came together,
And drowned old Pharaoh's army, etc. Hallelu!

A very curious musical effect is made in "Roll, Jordan, roll" by the unexpected introduction of a flat seventh. The words begin thus:

"Roll, Jordan, roll,
Roll, Jordan, roll,
I want to go to Heaven when I die,
To hear Jordan roll;
Oh brothers you ought t' have been there,
Yes, my Lord,
A sitting in the Kingdom,
To hear Jordan roll,
CHORUS.—Roll, Jordan, roll.

"Swing low, sweet chariot" tells how the singer hears a band of angels coming after him, to carry him over Jordan. Of "Sweet Canaan" it is said:—"My mother used to tell how the colored people expected to be free some day; and how, one night, a great many of them met together in a cabin, and tied little budgets on their backs as though they were going off somewhere, and prayed, and cried, and shook hands, and sung this song."

A very odd song runs as follows:—

Go chain the lion down,
Go chain the lion down,
Go chain the lion down
Before the heaven doors close,
Do you see that good old sister
Come a wagging up the hill so slow?
She wants to get to heav'n in due time
Before the heaven doors close.

Another popular song tells how "Mary and Martha just went along to ring those charming bells"—went "way over Jordan, Lord, to ring those charming bells." Another describes how "King Jesus rides on a milk white horse," with the rather inconsequential refrain: "No man can a hinder me." A version of the parable of "Ten Virgins" is sung to a very pleasing melody. We will, however, close here our extracts from these quaint rhymes with a verse of "Judgment Day."

Judgement Day is rolling around,
Oh! how I long to go;
I've a good old mother in the heaven, my Lord.
How I long to go there too;
There's a big camp-meeting in the heaven, my Lord,
Oh! how I long to go.
CHORUS.—Judgement Day, etc.

We have spoken of the music of these songs as American; but possibly it is of the real African origin. But whencesoever it comes it is certainly unique and entertaining, and not without its tinge of pathos. In addition to this, its hearty sincerity saves it from derision, even where it is weakest, in either sentiment or melody; for these strange religious ballads are the folks-songs of some four millions of the people of the United States.

Whitgift's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 5, 1873.

END OF THE VOLUME.—The present number completes the Thirty-second Volume and the Twenty-first Year of our Journal. The Title page and Index of the past two Volumes will take the place of the usual music pages in the first number of a new volume, after which there will be four pages of music in each number as before. The St. Matthew Passion Music of Sebastian Bach is finished with the present number. In No. 2 of the next Volume we shall begin the publication of Schumann's little Album pieces for the Pianoforte.

Harvard Symphony Concerts.

The ninth of the series of ten occurred on the 27th of March, which happened to be the anniversary of the day on which Beethoven died (in 1827). We commonly commemorate the birth rather than the death of a great man. The season of the advent is the season of rejoicing; but it is when the great man is taken away that the world first begins to realize how great he was; his death reminds us of his real worth; whereas he was born into the world unknown, unconsidered outside of a little circle. Our hero, poet, master, saint, is nearer to us when he dies than he has ever been before. So that there is some sense in the German custom of making an occasion of the anniversary of a great composer's death. Here there was the further motive of ministering to that strong preference and even passion for Beethoven's music, which has so long characterized this musical community, and which is never satisfied with any season's concerts in which he does not have the lion's share. Accordingly this was the programme:

Overture, "No. 1," to "Leonore," op. 138. [Now proved to be No. 3, composed in 1807]. Beethoven.
Triple Concerto, in C, op. 56, for Pianoforte, Violin and Violoncello. [Comp. 1804-5]. Beethoven.
Allegro.—Largo.—Rondo alla Polacca.
Ernst Perabo, Charles Hamm, and Wulf Fries.

Seventh Symphony, in A, op. 92. [Comp. 1812]. Beethoven.
Poco sostenuto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—Scherzo.
Allegro con brio.
Overture, "No. 3," to "Leonore," in C, Op. 72. [Now proved to be No. 2, comp. 1806]. Beethoven.

This programme drew the largest audience of the season, and on no occasion have we witnessed a more universal, unremitting, close attention. And there was every sign of general satisfaction. No! one sign was wanting: the clapping of hands was far from overwhelming, insignificant indeed compared with that which follows any flashy, trivial performance. The noble harmonies were drunk in and received in silence,—a silence irritating and confounding to those newspaper "critics," who measure Art and all appreciation of Art entirely by that noise thermometer, and know not what to say when that is wanting. Have we all lived so long and not found out that clap-trap always is more clapped than the best things are? that the most superficial, hacknied, ad captandum song will "bring the house down," while the noble aria of Handel or of Mozart will carry inward and sincere delight to an appreciative but less demonstrative audience? The cheaper things appeal to just the audience that is demonstrative; the nobler music is addressed mainly to another public, one somewhat prepared, one that listens from the soul, and may not think to lift its hands and clap just in the moment when it is most deeply moved, preoccupied with those interior vibrations which cease not with the tones by which they have been set in motion. It does not follow that that audience heard the great Beethoven works unmoved and joyless, because they did not break out into loud applause. In some cases that may be taken as a sign of coldness, but by no means in all. A comic actor, a punster, a prestidigitateur of the piano, a self-exhibitor of any sort, of course, has missed his mark when he is not applauded. But an artist, in the high, pure sense of Art, has aimed at a far higher mark, and possibly has hit that, even if your senses hear a very faint or even no reverberation; had you been in sympathy, you would have felt it though!

This Beethoven programme might, however, have been better. Programmes, with the best intentions, are liable to many accidents, so that their final shape is governed by fatalities. Did it ever occur to any of the gentlemen "critics" how completely a single whim or change of mind in a solo player may take all the vital unity, all the symmetry, all the character out of the best planned programme,—and that just when it is too late to reconstruct the whole ab ovo? Or how a sudden terrorism about too great length may prompt the leaving out of just the one little thing which would, by force of contrast, have made the whole seem shorter? In the present programme, for instance, the great E-flat Concerto would have given the relief of greater contrast with the other number of the first part, besides that it is a far more important representative Beethoven work, although the Triple Concerto in itself is very interesting, especially when played so finely as it was by Mr. PERABO (who has a special fancy for the work), as well as by his two associates.

The so-called "No. 1" of the four Overtures to "Leonore" (or "Fidelio") is by no means so great a work as the so-called "No. 3," (both of which, besides the Concerto, are in the major key of C,—another reason why the E-flat Concerto would have been better in this place). It is not so brilliant or effective an Overture, heard by itself, or at the beginning of the Opera, as the one in E, which Beethoven composed some eight years afterward. But the "No. 1," the real number three, has a peculiar interest when brought into comparison with the great "No. 3," which for a time it superseded; far more so than "No. 2" could have, since that is only the imperfect sketch of "No. 3." The smaller one, put at the beginning of this concert, was purposely composed because the "No. 3" was too great, dwarfing the music of the first part of the play. It has a singularly delicate and tender, spiritual beauty; a musing, tranquil and half dream-like character, as of a recalling in the memory of thrilling scenes, of which the excitement is long past; whereas its magnificent predecessor (which of course could only be put at the conclusion of the programme) brings you right into the midst of the exciting drama. This is the actual presence, the other is poetic reminiscence. To many excellent musicians, we are aware, this sort of relationship is something quite external, and of no account in music; while to them this smaller overture is too insignificant to be brought into such comparison with the much greater one. Schumann, however, was not of their mind; he speaks of it, under the innocent impression that it was the earliest, as "a beautiful, fresh piece of music, well worthy of Beethoven's genius." But, judging from the very close attention, we believe that most of that great audience were deeply interested in the piece with which the concert opened; and to all who were familiar with Beethoven's opera (as most could safely be assumed to be), that musing soliloquy of the violin, after the opening chord, must have seemed, as we expressed it once before, a thinking over as it were in memory of "my prisons," after time has healed the wounds and wrought sweet reconciliation.

We have only to add that the orchestra were present in full force this time, and that all the pieces, especially the Seventh Symphony and the last Overture, were remarkably well performed. The Symphony movements were taken in a much truer tempo, than they were when it was last played here (by the Thomas Orchestra). As to the great "Leonore" Overture, we doubt if it was ever brought out quite so well in Boston.

Thursday, April 10th, will close this eighth season of Symphony Concerts,—and grandly, with the inspired great Schubert Symphony in C, which by itself will form the second part. Part I., too, will be brilliant, fresh and varied,—also short; consisting of: 1. The bright Fidelio Overture in E. 2. The Soprano recitative and Aria from Rossini's Tell: "Selva opaca," by Miss CLARA DORIA. 3. Two little orchestral gems from Schumann's Manfred music, viz.: "Incantation of the Witch of the Alps" (first time) and the ever welcome Entr'acte. 4. Songs with pianoforte, by Lindblad, Schubert and Taubert (Miss DORIA).

Chamber Concerts.

Miss ANNA MEHLIG gave the first of three Piano Matinées, at Mechanics' Hall, on Wednesday, March 19th. The audience was flattering in character, but only moderate in numbers, since the announcement came late in a season nearly all preoccupied with chamber concerts. The programme was a rich one.

Sonata, C sharp minor, Op. 26. Beethoven.
Preludes and Fugues, C minor, D major. Seb. Bach.
Sacred Song [Pour out thy heart before the Lord]. Molière.

Mr. Varley.

Rondo, A minor. Mozart.
Songs without Words. Mendelssohn.

Scherzo, B flat minor, Op. 31. Chopin.
a.) "Si l'oiseau j'etais" [If I were a bird.]. Henselt.
b.) Poeme d'Amour. [Love Song.] Molloy.
Ballad [Flow'ret of the dale]. Molloy.

Mr. Varley.

Spinning Song [Flying Dutchman]... Wagner. List.
Soirees de Vienne [after Strauss]... Tausig.

Miss Mehlig's playing was never more brilliant, more finished, more expressive. Her rendering particularly of the Chopin Scherzo, and of the Liszt and Tausig transcriptions at the end, was really magnificent. The Preludes and Fugues of Bach too, from the earlier numbers of the "Well-tempered Clavichord," came faultless from her fingers, showing their fine imaginative quality as little tone-poems, though they are in the fugue form. The opening Adagio, and the little Allegretto and Trio of the "Moonlight Sonata" were beautifully played, and with true feeling. The swift, impassioned Finale, too, was brought out wonderfully well, except in one respect: to-wit an overdoing of expression by too much retarding of the tempo, particularly whenever the second theme comes in. The Mozart Rondo suffered from the same cause, as it did also (to our feeling) in the rendering of Rubinstein; the simple, naive piece was refined to an almost morbid sentimentalism, compelling it to express more than was intended by it. This is one of the tendencies which artists always before public,—publics not always very musical,—have to be upon their guard against.

Mr. VARLEY's voice was in excellent condition, and his rendering of the fine sacred aria by Molique, with violoncello obligato by WULF FAIR, was altogether satisfactory. The Ballad, too, was very sweetly sung, suiting his voice well, and charmed so much that he was obliged to repeat it.

For her second Matinée, Saturday, March 22, Miss Mehlig played the following selections:

Praeludium and Fugue, E minor.....Mendelssohn.
Menuetto, Op. 78.....Schubert.
Tarantella, C.....Heller.
Sonata, B flat minor, Op. 35.....Chopin.
Grave, Scherzo, Marche funebre, Presto.
Novelletta, D major, Op. 21.....Schumann.
Gnomentanz, E flat.....Seeling.
Venetia and Napoli.....Liszt.
Concert Etude, B flat minor.....Bendel.

The Mendelssohn Prelude and Fugue in E minor was not the very familiar one from "Notre Temps," but one of the six in Op. 35, the Prelude being a light and airy flight of arpeggios, the Fugue winding up with a grand solid Choral. The Chopin Sonata containing the well known funeral march was played entire for the first time here. The March and the short, swift Finale are the really taking parts of it, though it is all interesting, and placed the executive virtuosity of the performer in a brilliant light. The closing numbers of the programme appeared rather trivial. Between the parts a young Soprano singer, Miss ANNA STARNED lately returned from studies abroad, was introduced, who with a flexible, sweet voice, executed "Son vergine vezzosa" from I Puritani, with ease and fluency. We have not given the programme as it was printed; those who went with a curiosity to hear Miss Mehlig play in unknown keys ("E-sharp minor," "C-flat minor, &c.") were disappointed!

The third Matinée (Wednesday 26th) began with the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, in F, of Bach, superbly played. One of the simple, delicate Nocturnes by Field sounded very sweetly after it. This was followed by a brilliant, freakish Scherzo (Menuetto capriccioso) from the Sonata in A flat by Weber. Then Mr. VARLEY sang "Be thou faithful," from St. Paul, with fine voice and expression. And then came a rather puzzling novelty, and a very elaborate one, in the shape of a Sonata in F sharp minor, Op. 11, by Schumann. A task of immense difficulty, to which the lady was entirely equal. But either the composition is not one of the most clear and edifying among so many fine things of Schumann's, or it required preparation on the hearer's part.

The second part began with two poetic Etudes by Liszt: "Walderauschen" (rustling of leaves in the forest) and "Gnomensreigen" (dances of the gnomes). Mr. Varley sang Cherubini's Ave Maria, and Miss Mehlig closed the concert and the brief delightful series with three ever welcome things by Chopin Nocturne in G, op. 37, the Bercesse, and—we forget which Ballade,—the programme said in "F flat"!

Mr. B. J. LANG's second Thursday afternoon Concert, March 20, was even more interesting than the first, and in fact, both for the matter and the manner of performance, will be remembered among the best of our chamber concerts. Bach's Concerto in C major for two pianos,—even more beautiful than that for three pianos,—admirably played by Mr. DRESSEL and Mr. LANG, with string quartet accompaniment by Messrs. SCHULTZE, HAMM, RYAN and HENNING of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, gave a true tone to the feast from the beginning. Mr. Lang then played a Prelude in G minor and a Fugue in E major by Bach,—the former from one of the "English Suites," the latter from the second part of the "Well-tempered Clavichord," one of the most deep-felt, tranquilizing, sweet, religious, among all the Fugues, and of the most pure and perfect in the movement of its parts; you seem to hear four human voice parts in it. Both were beautifully played. Mendelssohn's Andante and Variations in D, op. 17, for violoncello and piano came next, a strong work, full of genius, in which Mr. Hennig's large and even tone, artistic style and execution told to great advantage. It was a great pleasure to hear once more that lovely, and in the middle part extremely bold, Nocturne by Chopin, in C minor, op. 48, interpreted in Mr. Lang's best style. Schumann's superb, rousing Quintet for piano, violins, &c., (heard once before this season in the concerts of Messrs. Leonhard and Eichberg), was given with great spirit and triumphant mastery, as if the whole thing were the inspiration of the moment. Indeed the composition bears that mark of genius: it seems to have all come out at one cast.

Messrs. LEONHARD and EICHBERG on the next day had their turn again. (Fourth Matinée, at Wesleyan Hall).

Trio, for Piano, Violin, Violoncello in B flat, Beethoven.
Allegro con brio. Adagio. Allegro con Variazioni.
Messrs. Hugo Leonhard, Julius Eichberg and Wulf Fries.
Chaconne [with Schumann's accompaniment].....Bach.
Miss Persis Bell.
Piano Solo, Scherzo, op. 20, C sharp minor.....Chopin.
Mr. Hugo Leonhard.
Quartet for Piano and Strings.....Schumann.
Sostenuto assai, Allegro ma non troppo; molto vivace; Andante cantabile; vivace.
Messrs. Leonhard, Eichberg, Mullaly and Fries.

The smaller B-flat Trio (op. 11) of Beethoven seldom shines into our concert rooms, compared with the great one, op. 97. Therefore all the more welcome; for it is a most genial, charming work. The Variations on the bright Italian sounding air from one of Weigl's operas are full of invention and fine contrast. It was very nicely rendered by the three artists. Miss PERSIS BELL's performance of the great Violin Chaconne by Bach was wholly without notes, firm and correct throughout, with almost faultless intonation. It is a task for the best skill of a mature artist; and for a girl hardly in the middle of her teens to deal so easily and surely with its difficulties shows force of character as well as talent. Mr. EICHBERG may be proud of his pupil. The fiery, swift Chopin Scherzo (the third) was capitally done by Mr. LEONHARD, and the grand Schumann Quartet, grandly played, was a vivid reminder of one of the best musical experiences of last year.

Mr. ERNST PERABO gave the first of two Matinées, at Wesleyan Hall, on Friday, March 23, assisted by Messrs. CHARLES HAMM and RUDOLPH HENNING. A large and sympathetic audience were present. His programme was unique:

Sonata, op. 110. A flat major.....Beethoven.
a. Moderato cantabile, molto espressivo.
b. Allegro molto. c. Adagio ma non troppo.
d. Fuga. Allegro ma non troppo.

"Album de Peterhof," 12 Morceaux pour Piano, op. 75. Rubinstein.

No. 1. "Souvenir." Moderato, C major.
No. 2. "Aubade." Moderato con moto. E flat maj.
No. 3. "Nocturne." Moderato assai. G major.
Douze Grandes Etudes, op. 21.....F. W. Grund.
(First time in Boston.)
Liv. 1, No. 1. Allegro con fuoco, C major.
Liv. 2, No. 9. Adagio con molto sentimento, E maj.
Grand Trio, op. 37. No. 3, B flat major. Wold. Bargiel.
a. Allegro moderato, con grazia.
b. Andante, molto sostenuto.
c. Scherzo, Allegro. d. Allegro moderato.
[Second time in Boston.]

The Beethoven Sonata, with its shifting moods of thought and passion, was rendered con amore, and so successfully that all were interested and would like to hear it many times. Perhaps the Fugue, however, was a little hurried in the excitement which it naturally engendered. The three little album pieces were among the most genial and pleasing of the smaller compositions we have heard by Rubinstein, and they could hardly have found a better interpreter, always excepting of course the composer himself. Of the two Etudes by Grund,—entirely a new author to us,—we thought the first had real character and beauty; but the Adagio, not very original in its theme, seemed overloaded with commonplace though finely elaborated ornament. The Trio by Bargiel (which we were obliged to lose when it was first played by the Quintette Club lately) is a spirited and striking composition, which we hardly know whether to like or not upon a single hearing. The Scherzo is quite taking; and we thought the audience generally seemed pleased with the whole work. It certainly had three strong forces combined in the rendering.

At his second matinée, next Friday, Mr. Perabo will play, with WULF FAIR, Beethoven's Sonata in D, op. 102, and an Adagio by Bargiel; also a Sonata by Hummel, a Barcarole by Dupont, and a Gavotte by Gluck.

THE KREISSMANN TESTIMONIAL CONCERT came upon a very rainy night (last Saturday,) and yet the Music Hall was very nearly full, while tickets enough had been sold to actually cram it. The programme might have been better, but the greater number seemed to relish it exceedingly. The Orchestra, under Mr. ZERRAEN, although the theatres reduced the number of violins, &c., played the Meeresschiffe and Der Freischütz Overtures, the Allegretto from the 8th Symphony, and for a close the "Wedding March" with a good will and quite effectively. The Orpheus, under their new leader, JULIUS EICHBERG, paid the tribute of several of their more familiar part-songs to the honored older leader and father of their order, under whom they used to sing the best part-songs and larger choruses composed for men's voices by Mendelssohn. The fresh young voices of the Boylston Club were joined with theirs in singing the hymn: "To thee, O Country," which Mr. Eichberg composed for the School Festival a year ago, and which was eagerly applauded now as it was then. Miss ADDIE S. RYAN sang Schumann's song: "Er der Herrlichste von allen" very finely; and Mr. VARLEY was imperatively encored in Handel's "Sound an alarm," besides which he sang "Be thou faithful" from St. Paul, instead of the Concert Aria by Mozart set down in the programme. About the most brilliant thing in the performance was the piece for two pianos, "Les Contrastes," by Moscheles, executed to a charm by Messrs. Lang and Dresel, Leonhard and Parker. Mr. Eichberg's Concertino for four violins (Messrs. Schultze, Hamm, Suck and Eichberg), with orchestra, was also well received.

The many friends of Mr. Kreissmann will rejoice to learn that the testimonial was a substantial one, and we all hope that it may cheer him in his illness, which has been so long and painful, and further his recovery.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 31.—We have been afflicted with a brief season of Italian Opera, which, fortunately, is now ended. The troupe, with one or two exceptions, was the same which had performed here during the past fall and winter season, but this time it was under the management solely of Mr. Maretzek, who has contrived to get rid of his old man of the sea, yclept Jarrett.

Of this Lenten season of Opera there is little to be said, save that two excellent artists, Mme. Lucca and Miss Kellogg, have been unable to redeem the general character of the performances, which were the most wretched and slovenly that I have ever witnessed. It is understood that the season has been pecuniarily successful, but, from the drift of public opinion, I judge that Maretzek and his enterprises will not be tolerated here in future.

Strakosch will be here next fall with Nilsson, and will, undoubtedly, give us a season of Opera which will be respectable, to say the least.

Among the concerts since the date of my last letter, I note the following.

The third "Soirée Classique" of the Onslow Quintette at De Garmo hall, on Wednesday Evening, March 5th, with the following programme:

Quintet, B flat, No. 15.....Mozart.
Part Songs. { a. Autumn Song. }
 { b. Praise of Spring. }.....Mendelssohn.
Violoncello Solo. Romanza.....A. Franchomme.
Part Songs. { a. "And wilt thou leave me thus. Florio."
 { b. "Come away death".....G. McFarren.
Quintet. C sharp minor.....Carl Graedener.

The vocalists were Misses Brainerd and Bulkley and Messrs. Bush and Shaffner. Mr. Bernhardt Bierlich played the violoncello, and Mr. Caryl Florio presided at the piano. The instrumental selections were well rendered, and the Graedener Quintet, which was a novelty, made a favorable impression. The last two parts, Menuetto and Allegro Energico quasi Marcia, are particularly good. The vocalists screamed with all their might, and the effect in the small hall was anything but pleasing.

Next came RICHARD HOFFMAN's third Piano-forte Soirée at Chickering Hall, on Saturday evening, March 8th, when the talented pianist interpreted an excellent programme to the most select and refined of audiences. This reminds me that I have omitted to mention Mr. Hoffman's Second recital on the evening of Feb. 22nd, when he played Mendelssohn's Variations sérieuses, op. 54; Schumann's Arabesque and Abendlied; a Mazourka and Valse by Chopin; Gottschalk's "Last Hope" and his own Fantasia on themes from "Faust." He also took part in Beethoven's trio, op. 1, the Sonata, Op. 5. No. 2, by the same composer, for piano and violoncello, and the Adagio and Allegro from Mendelssohn's Sonata, op. 4, for piano and violin. Mr. Hoffman was assisted by Mr. Burke and Mr. F. Bergner, and I have rarely listened to a programme so interesting and so well interpreted.

On Saturday, March 15, the N. Y. PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY gave their fifth concert at the Academy of Music. The following selections were performed:

Symphony. "Oxford." G maj.....Haydn.
Cavatina, "Bel Ruggio".....Rossini.
 Mdlle. Corradie.
Concert-Stueck.....Von Weber.
 Mr. Richard Hoffman.
Symphony. To the Divina Comedia.....Liszt.

The orchestral performance was, as usual, weak; and the vocalism only passable, the most artistic performance being Mr. Hoffman's excellent rendering of Weber's difficult Concert-Stück.

The appearance of this gifted artist is so rare here that it is considered a great privilege to be present at a concert when he plays, and he has long been considered as the most thoroughly classical and refined artist whom we have among us.

Liszt's Symphony to the Divina Comedia is the subject of much discussion, and, as the work of a thorough musician, it should be seriously considered; but I should wish to hear it again before attempting to describe it or to form any opinion concerning its merits.

The N. Y. Wagner Union was formed last fall, at the instance of Mr. Theo. Thomas, for the purpose of raising a fund to defray, in part, the travelling expenses of those of its members who will visit Baireuth on the occasion of the great Wagner Festival in 1874, and to purchase, for them, tickets of admission to the performance of the "Niebelung Ring." This fund is to be raised partly by subscription, and partly by the proceeds of two Concerts which Mr. Thomas and his orchestra are pledged to give in New York. The first of these concerts took place at Steinway Hall, on Friday evening, March 28th, before an audience, which, although not large, was composed of musical people. The programme consisted mainly of selections from Wagner's compositions, with which, thanks to the perseverance of Mr. Thomas, we are now tolerably familiar. It was divided into three parts, separated by brief intermissions, and opened with the overture to Der Fliegende Holländer, an opera which belongs to an early period of the composer's life; (it was produced in 1840) and which presents fewer eccentricities than his later works. The overture is massive and sombre, in which the weird idea of the Phantom Ship is plainly presented to the mind. This piece was followed by the exquisite Vorspiel to Lohengrin and part first ended with "Eine Faust Overture," which seems to have been written in one of the composer's most extravagant moods.

The second part was taken up by a masterly performance of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony.

Part Third was composed of two scenes from "Die Walküre."

a. Ritt der Walkueren.
b. Wotans Abschied.
with the vocal part by Mr. F. Remmert, and the Kaiser March, which concluded a most enjoyable concert.

DRESDEN, FEB. 17.—As to music here it is, as you know, abundant and good, whether at the Court Theatre or at the numerous concert rooms. Beginning with the latter, there are at least half a dozen places here where a most excellent orchestra of 40 or 50 players give an excellent programme, something like what our afternoon concerts of ten years ago offered, often including a symphony of Beethoven or Mozart, and always admirably played. While you listen you may drink your beer, or eat and drink whatever else you please, and stay as far into the long evening as you can stand the thick smoke, which makes the bright gas lamps in the farther end of the long hall as dim as a London fog does the street lamps, and irritates one's eyes finally beyond endurance. These entertainments cost 5 groschen (about 12 1-2 cents) including programme, (which you elsewhere pay for extra) and which also answers the purpose of what we call a "check." It is getting a good deal of what is very good for your money.

Then there are the innumerable occasional concerts of the wandering stars of the musical world, from Ullman with his satellites to Clara Schumann and Joachim and other lesser celebrities: no end of charity concerts for the sufferers by the flood in the North Sea; the admirable trio and quartet concerts in the Hotel de Saxe, where one finds the best music and the elite of music lovers; and lastly, but by no means least, contrariwise greatest, the Symphony Concerts of the Court Theatre Orchestra given in the Gewerbehaus, under the lead of Julius Riets, and a younger conductor, Schuch. These are as good as orchestral concerts can be, and the winter series of six, offers, with many standard compositions, a good many novelties. In the concerts thus far have been given the 2nd and 3d Symphonies of Beethoven, 3rd of Schumann, G minor of Mozart, "Fantastique" of Berlioz, Suites by Bach and Lachner; Overtures: Normannenfahrt by Dietrich, Jubel, by Weber, Semiramis by Catel, Aben- cerages by Cherubini, and others. The programmes generally have only 3 numbers, that of the last concert being as follows: 1. Overture: "Abencerages," Cherubini; Variations on an original theme for grand orchestra, by W. Taubert (1st time). II. Overture to Richard III., Robert Volkmann (1st time); Symphony in G minor, Mozart. The concerts begin at 7 and end at 8 1-2, a striking contrast to the interminable programmes and late hours of the London concerts.

The theatre is now a temporary wooden building, which will be used till the completion of the new edifice to replace the one which, as you know, was burned some two years ago. The new one progresses slowly, and for several years the Dresden theatre will be the wooden shanty now standing near where the old one stood. It is however admirably arranged for seeing and sound, and is the best temporary music room I ever was in. I have heard a good deal in the way of opera this winter, going mainly to such operas as I had not previously known, and such as we never have at home, such as Wagner's Rienzi, Meistersinger and Lohengrin; Gluck's Orpheus and Armide; Schubert's Hänsel's Krieg. The prime donne are Mme. Otto-Alvleben and Mme. Kausz-Prause, who are equal to rendering any roles. Besides these there are a host of lesser lights, and the best chorus that I ever heard in a theatre, for execution and musical voices, equal to our best choice picked choruses, such as we sometimes get together from private circles, but never dream of hearing in a theatre.

Apropos of theatres, I went to the new opera house in Vienna, which is the finest theatre externally and in its internal arrangement that I ever saw. I was sorry not to hear an opera there, only a superb ballet being given while I was there. I should like if I could give you a realizing sense of a tragedy that I saw in Prague, performed in the Bohemian language; but my pen is not equal to rendering its horrors adequately, so I forbear.

Music Abroad.

PARIS.—The Choral Symphony of Beethoven was brought out with such splendid success by the Société des Concerts at the Conservatoire, that it had to be repeated in the two succeeding concerts.

All the musicians of Paris, says Le Ménestrel, were eager to become acquainted at last with some of the important works of BACH, "that patriarch of music, and foster-father, as it were, of all the greatest geniuses." Accordingly a hearing was organized for the 11th of March, at the Salle Pleyel, by M. Lamoureux, which attracted a select public.

"The stance commenced with a Concerto for two pianos, with orchestra, very well played by MM. Delaborde and Fissot. The former artist also executed another Concerto, of which the first movement was altogether charming. Two choruses, from his sacred Cantatas, produced a great effect, in spite of some hesitations in the female voices. Mlle. Adèle Monnier won applause in the beautiful Cradle Song from the Christmas Oratorio. Finally, two fragments of an Overture for flute and orchestra, played in a grand style by M. Taffand, that eminent and excellent artist, completed the first part of the concert. The second part was still more interesting. It contained an entire work, the Dramma per musica: "The Quarrel between Phœbus and Pan." The introduction (for orchestra and chorus) is a magnificent page of brilliancy and grandeur. Each of the personages then sings his Air, separated by recitatives from Airs by other characters (Momus, Mercury, &c.). By two of these the audience were ravished, namely the air of Pan (bass), full of frank gaiety and drollery, sung with verve and good round tone by M. Bataille, and that of Momus, the god of laughter sparkling with malice, which Mlle. Marcus sang with a great deal of spirit. The imitative hi! han! hi! han! of the violins created great diversion during the air of Midas, which for the rest is of the ordinary cut, like those of Phœbus and of Mercury." The article ends with praise to M. Lamoureux, and a strong desire to hear more of "old Bach."

London.

MME. SCHUMANN'S RECITALS.—Second Recital.—The beautiful "posthumous" sonata of Schubert in B flat, headed the scheme. This was so finely played that the Emperor Joseph II. of Austria would have undoubtedly encored the whole work, if his spirit had been present. Bach's "Partita" in G, with an Andante and Presto of Scarlatti [a dual number] succeeded. Mendelssohn's "Variations" in E flat, provoked an encore, which was responded to by the most acceptable performance of Schumann's indescribably beautiful "Arabesque" in C. The "Carnaval [Scenes Mignonnes]" of this same inexhaustible Robert Schumann, a fantastic, but rather rambling and certainly very peculiar piece, concluded the afternoon's entertainment.

Mme. Lavrowska [who appeared for the last time Friday evening], was encored in both her songs,—Schubert's "Death and the Maiden," and Schumann's "Waldegespräch," or romantic dialogue between another luckless fair one and the terrible "Lorely" of the Rhine. Mme. Schumann, at this matinee, played with remarkable energy as well as finesse. The audience, in fact, were slow to leave the hall, so anxious were they to "talk over" matters, and to vent their enthusiasm.—Standard.

According to her annual custom, Mme. Schumann—whose brilliant reception at the Monday Popular Concerts, on the occasion of her first appearance for the season, was described not long since—gave two pianoforte recitals on her own account. At the first, on Wednesday week, in St. James's Hall, the accomplished lady began with her late husband's "Études en forme de Variations," which Schumann dedicated to "son ami William Serrandale Bennett," who, in return, dedicated to Schumann his own admirable Fantasia in A major. The original title of the piece, which stands as Op. 13 in the published compositions of the master, was "Douze Études Symphoniques." A more trying and difficult work of its kind can scarcely be named. There are twelve variations, all constructed upon a very singular theme, confided, it is said, to Schumann by an amateur; and the whole takes up a good half-hour in performance. Nevertheless, difficult as are the variations, which tax the powers of the executant more and more severely as one succeeds another, Mme. Schumann plays them from beginning to end without book, and plays them superbly—as, indeed, she does whatever proceeded from the pen of her husband, whose music lies as deep in her heart as it flows readily under her hands. Admirable as is her interpretation of the music of other masters, she is never, in our opinion, so entirely herself, so beyond all rivalry, as in that of Schumann, whose spirit seems to breathe through her fingers. Many would, therefore, have liked more of Schumann than was contained in the programme of Wednesday week's recital; and, in fact, if the entire selection had been made out of Schumann's works, vocal and instrumental, not a soul in the room would have complained. As it happened, the only other excerpts from the same source were three fancy pieces—"Aufschwung" ["Soaring"], "Warum" ["Why"], from Op. 12; and Scherzino, from Op. 26—each attractive in its way, each, it is almost superfluous to add, given in perfection, but each, to a certain extent, familiar. Mme. Schumann vouchsafed no more.

Among other compositions brought forward by the gifted pianist was J. S. Bach's so-called "Italianisches Concerto" [Italian Concerto], which Kuhnau, a contemporary of Bach's styled simply "Klavier-Sonata," and which, if it really did emanate from the genius of Bach, a fact that some in the face of traditional quasi-authority deny, is comparatively one of the least important works of its kind with which that most learned, ingenious, and profound of musicians is accredited. It was played, however, in such a style as to win a "recall" for the player, who earned further honors in a Nocturno by Chopin, and a couple of Schubert's charming "Moments Musicaux," the last of which [in F minor] was encored. These also Mme. Schumann performed without book.

The remaining pieces were the Adagio from Spohr's Ninth Violin Concerto, very cleverly executed (and with deserved success) by Mlle. Friese, well accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Sauerbrey, who also accompanied Mme. Sauerbrey in songs by Gounod and Schubert.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—On Saturday afternoon, the 8th instant, the programme was headed by the second—in our opinion by far the best—of the "Rasoumowski" quartets, the one in E minor, now led by Herr Joachim, as it was, before Christmas, [if our memory does not fail us] by Mme. Norman Neruda. Schubert's tuneful pianoforte trio in B flat [Op. 99] was played, at the close, by Mme. Schumann, with MM. Joachim and Piatti. "Sorrowful, lyrical, and feminine," such are the epithets applied to this trio by the admiring and sympathetic Schumann, but we do not see the force of the first adjective. Except the andante in E flat, the movements have always appeared to ourselves remarkably vivacious, full of "animal spirits," and joyous abandonment to the impulse of the hour. Mme. Schumann played Beethoven's solo sonata in E flat, Op. 29, making, out of many points, a capital one in its quaint staccato of the scherzo in A flat, of which movement, by the way, the startling second theme in F was well taken up. Herr Joachim repeated, by desire, Bach's sonata in A minor (the andante and the allegro movements). Mlle. Nita Gaetano [Miss Mackay, from the U. S. A.] the vocalist, sang Haydn's "Sympathy," and Sir J. Benedict's "Tamo."

The following is a copy of the Monday evening's programme:

VIENNA.—Gluck's Iphigenia was to have been revived at the Imperial Opera house some time ago, but for various reasons, including the indisposition of some of the principal artists, the public are still looking forward to the first performance, or, at least were looking forward to it a day or two ago.—The season of Sig. Merelli's Italian Operatic season, which commenced on the 10th inst., at the Theater an der Wien, is to extend to the 1st May. Among the principal artists are Mmes. Adelina Patti, Barbara Marchisio, MM. Nicolini, Naudin, Graziani, and Vidal. Conductor, Signor Ardit. —Herr Feustl, banker, of Bayreuth, has just paid this city a visit. His object in coming was—not to put too fine a point on it—to "go round with the hat," for the Grand-National-Festival-Stage-Play-Theatre now in course of erection at Bayreuth.—It appears that the Universe has not exhibited the alacrity they ought to have exhibited in contributing to the funds for this great Wagnerian project. Some hundreds of thousands of thalers are still wanting, and 1874 is fast approaching.—London Musical World.

HAMBURG.—A four-act comic and romantic opera, Waldmeister's Brautfahrt, music by Herr Adolf Mueller, has been produced at the Stadttheater, but achieved at most only a succes d'estime. Referring to this opera, a writer in a German contemporary observes: "There is a kind of music which has gradually fallen into discredit and disrepute; it is commonly known under the title of 'conductor's music' (Kapellmeistermusik). For the benefit of any one to whom the term may be unintelligible, we beg to offer the following short explanation: A conductor, who conducts so and so many operas a week, becomes at last convinced that it is, after all, not so very difficult to manufacture something like what he has before him; nay, he believes, as he is practically a thorough musician, and knows all about the stage and the requirements of the public, that he cannot fail of success. He is, from long use, perfectly familiar with the tablature of operas, and is a famous adept at what Lessing denominates in literature 'the official style,' as to anything else necessary for the creation of so difficult a work—as for any indispensable quality which his good angel may have refused him, he troubles his head no further about it; he either does not deem it worthy of consideration, or in his conceit, imagines it will come to him in his sleep. Thus it is that there spring into life those weakly bantlings, which usually never behold the light of the foot anywhere but at the theatre where their authors occupy the post of conductor, and which, after a short existence, are doomed to be forever buried beneath the dust of the library of the theatre. This is called 'conductor's music,' and, unfortunately, Waldmeister's Brautfahrt must be considered a specimen of it."

BREMEN.—Herr Max Bruch's last work, Odyseus, has been successfully executed by the Singacademie, under the direction of the composer. The two principal solo parts of Odyseus (Ulysses), and Penelope were sung by Herr Schelper and Mlle. Keller, both of the Stadttheater.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC, Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- EASTER CAROLS.
Now He is Risen. 3. D to e. Tomkins.
Hail the bright morn. 3. Bb to f. Carr.
The first has one part only, and the last is for mixed voices.
- The Evening Star. 3. G to f. F. A. Strauss. 30
"Brightly shines the evening star."
Pretty melody with flowing "arpeggio" accompaniment.
- Just beyond the Pearly Gates. Song & Cho. Pratt. 30
3. Eb to g.
"Longing fondly, longing for us,
In their heavenly joy they wait."
There cannot be too many of these beautiful "gate" songs. This is the last, and very good.
- Beneath the Waves. Contralto Song. 4. Eb to e. Smart. 35
A sad but musical description of the "world beneath the waters."
- Fairest One, when first I met thee. 3. G to e. Fitz. 30
"Thee I worship, fairest one!"
Musical lovers take notice! Here is another pretty thing to sing to the adored one.
- So the Story goes. 3. G to g. Molloy. 30
"Twas on a summer's day,
So the story goes,
A little maid did stray,—"
Admirable. Charming little story, which "goes" as musically as the brook that carried the lost rose to the Miller's son.
- No Father, no mother. Song & Cho. 2. Ab to d. Danks. 30
"From morn until night I am walking the street."
A beautiful, simple, touching ballad.
- Little Darling. Song and Cho. 3. Eb to e. Danks. 30
"Would you kiss me again, little darling,
And lay your sweet head on my breast;
Charming, and no mistake.
- Friar Bacon. From "Selections of Old English Songs." 2. A to e. 30 "With that a merry devil
To take an airing vowed,
Huggle, huggle, ha! ha! ha!
Peculiar but good old song, as are the 15 contained in the "selections" all, no doubt, rare favorites in their day.

Instrumental.

- Fairy Queen. (Reine des Fées.) 4 hands. 4. Ab. S. Smith. 1.00
- May Pole Dance. 4. C. " 1.00
Sydney Smith is one of the most brilliant of composers, but his works have been, in general, too difficult for ordinary players. The above two pieces, however, if skilfully fingered, are hardly above the 3d degree of difficulty, and are as brilliant in this arrangement as in any other.
- Little Bird's Nest.
No. 3. Piggie Buck Galop. 1. C. Mack. 39
"9. Little Birdie's Dead March. 1. A min. 30
Little lirdies who are learning to play will take these among their first pieces.
- Recreation. Polka Redowa. 2. Bb. Bonn. 30
Useful instructive pieces.
- Melodious 5 Finger Studies for 4 hands. Behrens. In 3 Nos. each 75
Complete. 1.50
5 Finger Exercises are very useful, and (speak it softly) a little tiresome. But the 4 hand arrangement, and the "tunes" which are evolved greatly lighten the task of practicing them.
- Eight Hands. Music well-arranged for 2 Pianos. 4 Performers.
Overture to Martha. 4. Horn. 1.75
Soldier's Chorus. (Faust). 4. Schubert. 1.00
These are noble things for exhibitions, and, when well-played, have almost an orchestral effect.
- Pupils Recreation. 6 moderately easy and elegant pieces. Wels. ea. 35
1. Polonaise. 4. F.
The "instructive" quality betrays itself at once. Excellent practice.
- Middlemarch Waltz. 4. Tolmatschoff-Strauss. 60
Tolmatschoff is one "variety" of Strauss, and the waltz is brilliant and Strauss-y.

ABBREVIATIONS.—Degrees of difficulty are marked from 1 to 7. The key is marked with a capital letter, as C, B flat, &c. A small Roman letter marks the highest note, if on the staff, an italic letter the highest note, if above the staff.
